Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

What Harry Underwood Said to Madge About Lillian's Plan.

"Well, I'll be—"

Mr. Underwood smothered the expletive, substituted an innocuous "horn swoggled" and stood staring at me with a chagrin so palpable that I promptly suppressed the desire to laugh which was obsessing me.

"That he was suffering keen humiliation at the mischance of his memory which had compelled me to use for the retrieving of a garage check the scarab which he had so melodramatically given me for use in an emergency, was unmistakable. But his spirits were too volatile for him to indulge in any mood long, and in another half minute his mouth quirked into a reluctant grin.

"Well, that's certainly one on old Harry," he said, unconsciously echoing Lillian's comment of a few hours earlier. "Serves me right for trying to play a serious part with what Merton of the Movies would term this 'low comedy face of mine.'"

This was so obviously absurd, for there are few more impressive looking men in the world than Harry Underwood, that I permitted myself the smile I had rigidly kept from my lips.

Harry is Disappointed.

"Do you really expect me to agree with that?" I asked quietly, and with a side glance at my twitching lips, he burst into a hearty laugh. "I'd probably murder you if you did," he said, and then he added a rather sheepish, "It is funny, isn't it?" to which I returned a demure assent, and with a transition to a matter-of-fact manner which was as sudden as it was relieving, he began to search through the pockets of the overcoat.

"Of course, the blasted thing is in my other coat," he said. "But, anyway, you don't want to go around to that garage by yourself. How are you going to get out of the city? You're not going to try driving through traffic by yourself."

"No," I replied meekly, and then with sudden vehemence. "But the very next thing I do when I have a day's leisure is to practice driving through the city streets. I'm thoroughly tired of being so helpless."

"Allah have mercy on your soul, when you try it," he commented. "But who is going to drive you? I'm at your service, you know."

"I believe Lillian has everything arranged," I said primly.

"Yes, she would," he retorted with distinct disappointment in his voice. "So I suppose there's nothing more for me to do but to get your chariot out in front here as soon as possible. When will you be ready?"

"I didn't think it of Lil!"

"I am ready now," I answered. "And Miss Fawcett and Mamie, if she goes, ought to be ready to start in 15 minutes."

"Miss Fawcett and Mamie," he reiterated staring at me. "Do you mean that Lil is going to turn that chimpanzee of a Mamie over to your escort, and what does she expect you to do with the dream of Latin beauty? Surely not to take her into your home?"

I shot a quick furtive look at him. I was quite sure that he never had seen Mollie Fawcett. How, then, did he know her type?

I answered the question even as I asked it. Lillian, in that brief conversation with him the night before, must have told him something of the girl. With a sudden catching of my breath, I wondered if her confidences had extended to Dicky's reaction to the charm of Mollie Fawcett, and it took all my will-power to answer him nonchalantly.

"Why not?" I asked coolly. "Lillian wishes to get her out of the city for a few days, and the farmhouse is an ideal spot for rusticiating, you know."

Mr. Underwood muttered something under his breath, then spoke aloud with distinct irritation in his tones: "I didn't think it of Lil, although I might have known she'd sacrifice anything or anybody when she's on a trail. But she has a crust to send that girl into your home, knowing—"

He broke off abruptly and turned quickly toward the door.

"But, of course, as you'll remind me in another second or two, it's none of my business; so please forgo my presumption, Lady Fair. I'll have the little bus around here by the time you're ready. You don't need to hurry. I'll wait in it until you're ready."

He was out of the door before I could answer him, and for a few seconds on I stood motionless, looking after him. Some way I knew that his reason for bringing the car himself to the door was because he wished to inspect Mollie Fawcett, and it was given me also to know in that moment that it was solely on my account that he wished to look at the girl.

Unbelted gowns continue to be the rage in Paris and they are very, very short at the present time.

Summer Dessert.

A delightful summer dessert may be made by putting thin slices of cake together with a layer of ice cream, sandwich fashion, and serving fresh fruit on top.

Three-strand pearl necklaces that hug the neck quite closely are a novelty in accessories that offers a contrast from the long single chains that have had such a vogue.

YOUR PROBLEMS

Martha Allen

Unrequited Love.

Dear Miss Allen: For nearly two years I have known a young man whom I dearly love. This is the strange part—he has never offered to take me out though I have been dying to go out with him. However, whenever we met, which was accidentally, never by appointment, we spoke frankly and intimately. Naturally as I was very much interested I used to ask him all about himself and we had quite lengthy conversations. But that was all. He is always on my mind. It's all right to say that this is infatuation. But do you think that always having a man in mind, loving him, worshipping him, thinking the world of him is infatuation? As I understand it, infatuation dies, but this has not.

As I was very anxious to see him, I had a party at my home and naturally invited him. He promised he would be up, but disappointed me and did not even give me any reason why he did not come, although he said to a friend of mine, "I was so sorry I couldn't come."

Will you please help me out? Isn't there a chance? Has all my faith gone to waste? Have I really been a fool? I have shed many tears and have suffered immensely, but nevertheless I have always had hope.

BEWILDERED.

Yes, to answer that last question of yours first, and answer it quite simply—yes, you have been foolish. Do not misunderstand me. I do not mean to be unkind.

You do not love this man. You cannot love anyone whom you know so slightly. You have had a number of frank chats with him when you happened to meet. That is all.

He appeals to you—that is, the fleeting impressions you have had of him attract you. But you will have to know and understand him much better than you do before you can judge whether he is lovable and before you can be sure you love him.

Now, the best way to get acquainted with a man whom you would like to number among your friends is to invite him to your home. There he can meet your friends and parents, and there you will learn to understand each other better as good friends.

This step to better acquaintance and friendship you did take. You asked him to your home. He accepted your invitation, then failed to keep his engagement with you and has not even explained to you why or in any way apologized.

That was rudeness—just plain bad manners. You see, he failed to make the grade in qualifying for the trustworthiness that is the foundation of friendship and love.

Give him one more chance to make good if you still have faith in him. Ask him once more to call. Treat him with friendly comradery.

But if he does not accept this invitation, or accepting it does not keep his appointment, you will be wise to let him alone.

Nora: It is a wonderful thing to know when to talk and when to keep still.

Many girls write me asking how they can overcome shyness and learn to converse freely. But it is a still more valuable gift to know when not to talk and how to talk without saying too much.

If you are wondering why your girl chum doesn't call up as often as she used to, or why John suddenly ceased calling, if you are puzzled over
