"In a week's time after I began taking Lanlac I was always ready to eat, my stomach soon became sound, my digestion perfect and then my hopeless, helpless condition gave place to my old time health, energy and strength. Lanlac has made a life-long friend of me."

Your Problems

Martha Allen

Lost in the Mails.

Dear Miss Allen: Could you please tell me what became of the story written by Adele Garrison, "My Husband's Love?"

I have read the story for many years and am very interested. Thank you, A READER, (M. A. J.)

The story is running again. A few installments of it were lost in the mails, but they have been duplicated and have already appeared.

Lonesome: I cannot undertake to bring together men and women whom I do not know. There are many natural and proper ways of meeting men, and they are the ones I commend you to.

To the Woman of 34: If you like this man so well why don't you try to please him part of the time. It sounds to me as though you expected him always to do the pleasant thing. I fear you are one of the demanding type, not willing to really try to do your part to get along. If he likes to live in the country you ought to be willing to move there. It is up to a man, you know, to make the living, and a woman ought to be willing to accept the home he provides for her.

Babbette: Don't try to put on airs just to make yourself popular. You won't succeed that way. Be honest with yourself. No, don't kiss the boys and don't lecture them. Let your example and your conduct reveal your attitude. You are not entitled to act as a censor for your friends. It is enough for you to guard your own conduct.

Ted: Certainly you are too young to contemplate matrimony. Wait until you support yourself before you undertake the responsibility of maintaining a home.

Blue Eyes: If what you tell me is true, your father is wrong. You are young to go with boys, it is true, but a nice, respectable boy is better company for a girl at an evening party than another girl. Your father should recognize the fact that you are entitled to the companionship of young men. Be patient with father, however. He merely loves you and wants to protect you and doesn't realize how grown up you are. Are you quite sure you act sensibly?

Henry W. Yates Parent-Teacher Association.

The first meeting of the year of the Henry W. Yates Parent-Teacher association was held Wednesday afternoon. Several visitors were present, among them Mrs. Arthur Sonderger, who is active in the Parent-Teacher association at Beatrice. A feature of the meeting was the presentation of a gavel to the president, Mrs. Howard Saxton, by Mrs. R. H. Bloodgood, who is the president of the newly organized Parent-Teacher association at Field school.

Mrs. Gannaway spoke in the interest of the near east relief, presenting a little Armenian girl.

Mrs. Collins of the better home lighting campaign gave an instructive talk.

The meeting closed with the social hour.

What Dicky Thought About His Mother's Fear.

Not daring to come into the hall for fear the sight of me would spoil the effect of my ruse, I watched my small son through a crack in my door, and silently applauded the success of his appeal to my mother-in-law. For Junior, who adores his grandmother, had for bettered my injunction to tell her he was sorry for the naughtiness which was primarily the cause for her brainstorm. Letting loose the genuine grief and terror which was in his small heart, he was weeping so wildly that Mother Graham was compelled to check the sweep of her emotions for a moment in order to pacify him.

"Granzie's darling baby," she said, her voice tremulous and ragged with the tears she was suppressing. "I know you love her, sweetheart, if nobody else does. Come into Granzie's room, and sit in her lap and comfort her."

The tears of self-pity overflowed again as she began to walk toward her room, leading her small grandson by the hand. But she was compelled to check them again, for Junior began to dance up and down in a spasm of terror.

"Don't cry, Granzie!" he shrieked. "Don't cry!"

"No, precious, I won't," she promised and then her door closed after them. I opened mine gingerly, and Dicky, who had been standing in the hall, dodged expertly into my room.

"Shut the door quietly," he urged, wiping his forehead in a burlesque of tension, relieved. "Gee, but that was a close thing! I expected to be strewn all over the landscape if mother got to going good. You sure threw out the shock troops just in time. Poor Junior! He was frightened half out of his senses by her, but he certainly turned the trick. Of course, I know you sent him out, but he must have added a few flourishes on his own account. Even your fertile brain couldn't have staged all that stunt."

"Still sore?"

There was a levity in his voice that grated. Dicky had been mostly responsible for his mother's brainstorm, and he had been a witness of the suffering which had come to her at her inadvertent mention of her dead daughter's name. Yet, he could laugh, and treat the whole sad exhibition as if it had been a puppet show arranged for his entertainment.

I told myself that it was this apparent callousness of Dicky's which aroused my resentment. But in a deeper, more honest stratum of my soul I knew that my real grievance was his delay in apologizing for the cause—that's all! Ninety-nine per cent of the time, your mother wouldn't change places with any other woman in the world, but the other 1 per cent she does suffer with the most natural longing of any woman's heart—for a place of her very own. And you ought to realize it and make allowances for her."

Dr. and Mrs. William N. Anderson arrive home next week following a summer in Europe.

I told Junior nothing except to say that he was sorry for his actions. I said a trifle coldly. "The child was wild with terror at her threat to leave."

Dicky walked up to me, put his hands on my shoulders, swung me around facing him and looked steadily into my eyes.

"Still sore?" he inquired off-handedly, but there was a subtle note in his voice that suddenly made it impossible for me to cherish resentment against him.

A Woman's Heart.

"Not very," I said smiling, then added more soberly. "But I don't think mother's brainstorm this time is a subject for levity. There have been times when I have been irritated or amused at her. But don't you realize how horribly she must be suffering just now because of her realization that there is no place on earth for her but just this house, our home? For the first time she fully comprehends that with Lisa dead and Harriet in South America, she must stay here, whether she wishes to or not."

"I don't realize anything of the sort," Dicky rejoined stubbornly. "I call mother a mighty lucky woman if you ask me. She has a comfortable home and the best room in the house. She is waited on like a princess—no, they're apt to be doing the waiting nowadays—well—say like a bootlegger's daughter."

"She doesn't express a wish that isn't gratified," he went on more soberly, "and when she stages one of these tantrums she is humored and coaxed out of it, instead of being soundly spanked as she would be if she were 60 years younger. Where do you get this 'horrible suffering' stuff? When you think of the thousands of old women scrubbing floors for pay or being household drudges in the families of relatives who don't want them, or—"

"Everything you say is true," I said, "but—you can't understand a woman's heart—because—well be-
