Long Live King Ak

Who shall deary glorious pageantry which links us for the moment with the knights and the days of old?

GABBY has found the most tactful bachelor, which is rather a distinction. He's also a great host, and incidentally is connected as mine host with a successful hostelry.

Last week he gave a dinner, where place cards with a question for each guest, helped pass the pleasant hours away.

He discovered however when he arrived that he had forgotten a prize, and quickly promised that a suitable one should be awarded later when the ladies would turn their answers in in handwriting.

Unfortunately he had reckoned not on the cleverness of his guests, and when the answers came in he discovered that no one was more deserving than the others.

He enlisted the aid of a fair accomplice in solving his problem, and she secured and mailed out for him a handsome pair of hose to each of the contenders, with the simple message, "A prize for wit."

The next day, his mail revealed a bewildering array of dashing envelope loops, each enclosing a suave little note of thanks. Just the next little purr one would write in acknowledgement to an eligible bachelor who has found one the cleverest of his set.

Tactful but expensive, Gabby calls it!

IN CONNECTION with the approaching "get out the vote" luncheon on Saturday, two women were discussing political responsibility at a down town club one day this week.

"Wouldn't it horrify you to have to do jury duty?" said one.

"Yes, but it would horrify me more to know men think I am not capable of doing it!" was the reply.

ADDITIONAL interest in our present queen centers in the fact that she may be the first royalty in many years to announce her betrothal during her reign. She is, of course, the recipient of a great deal of attention, but one suitor, more persistent than the rest, has been seen with her at all public affairs. The day the world fliers made their appearance here, the queen and her swain, were remarked as one of the most attractive couples pacing about in the reserved section.
