

A Wife's Confessional Adèle Garrison's New Phase of REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

(Copyright, 1924.)
The Excitement Katie Felt Over a Chinese Visitor.
"Oh, Misses Graham, could you come by the kitchen vance?" Katie's voice and her dancing eyes showed excitement, and with a deprecating little nod to Dicky I followed my volatile little maid from the library. Secretly, I was much relieved at the opportunity to get away from the discussion of the changes Dicky had proposed in our schedule of living. I wished time to null over the suspicion which had come to me that all was not right with our finances, and I certainly could not consider the question with Dicky in the offing.

"Is there anything the matter, Katie?" I asked, as I hastened my footsteps to suit her swift ones.
"No, nothing," she returned; "only sometimes queer. Dot laundry man he come out here, ask to see you bout wash. Now vy he come? I refer see Chink leave laundry before. Vot you tink? He planning carry somebody off to Chinatown, maybe?"
"How silly, Katie!" I rejoined, with the private notation that if my little maid did not curb her fertile imagination in its favorite pastime of applying her idealized movie reels to her everyday life we sometimes should find ourselves in a most ridiculous situation of her blundering. But I felt my own curiosity stir as I entered the kitchen and saw the familiar stumpy figure of the Chinese laundry man who had done our flat work ever since we moved to the farm.

"Indeed I like it."
He was standing respectfully near the door, and as I entered his eyes with the absolute lack of expression to which centuries of repression has drilled his race, looked at me fixedly and continued their solid gaze as long as he stayed.
"How do," he said laconically as I greeted him. And then, with a quick out thrust of his hands, "You good customer. You like?"
He had put into my hands a most exquisite little round jar, which I knew from my experience of Oriental shops contained a favorite delicacy of mine—preserved ginger.
"Oh, indeed I like it!" I exclaimed sincerely, and then hesitated for a second. Did he mean to give it to me or was he trying to make a sale? I know that I should mortally offend him if the former supposition were correct and I should offer him money for it. Fortunately, he came to my rescue, from accident or design, I could not tell which.

"Take it," he said, stepping back. "Its yours."
I knew better than to protest and thanked him profusely.
"Sometime maybe you come down see shop?" he said hopefully. "All fix up, these in windows, more things."
Katie's Imagination Leaps.
"Indeed, I shall come down very soon," I said enthusiastically, for in Dicky's ridiculous parlance I am "completely bugs" about the attractive Oriental trinkets which the Chinese shops display. "Have you real Chinese tea for sale?"
He smiled, with the effect of having answered the jerk of a string. "Very nice," he said with careful enunciation. Then, with a rather abrupt "goodby," he turned and plodded his way out of the kitchen.

Katie flew past me to the window as he closed the door.
"Vot you tink," she queried excitedly. "Dot Chink, he come in automobile; big vun."
"Why shouldn't he, Katie?" I asked.
"Oh, you tink everything always all right?" she said, tossing her head. "But you know vot I tink?"
"Tell me," I said smiling.
"I tink dis all vun great hee bluff," she said. "Vy shouldn't he come out here mit nice ting for you? He no do dot for oder customers."
In obedience to a sudden, curious impulse I hurried out of the room, with an admonition to Katie to wait until I returned. In my own room, with the door closed, I took down the telephone receiver, called two women I knew were customers of the laundry, and from them, in off-hand fashion, I verified the statement of the laundryman that he had installed tea and curios in his shop. Both of them had received presents of ginger jars, and I went back to Katie triumphantly.

"You musn't let your dramatic ideas run away with you, Katie," I said smilingly. "He has started a shop and he is distributing the jars to his customers."
"I no care," she muttered stubbornly. "Dot makes eet all more bluff. Always in movies und plays Chink he do dot—feex ting so everybody have same und vun dey vant von't suspect. I tell you, dot old devil shoost vanted chance to look you ofer so he could tell somebody else shoost how you look, den dey come kidnap you. You see?"
