The Happy Surprise With Which Junior Greeted Madge.

"Well! What are you waiting for?" Mother Graham looked up imperiously from the armchair in which I had ensconced her, and from which she had issued the command to bring Junior to her.

"Because there is nothing to hurry for," I parried. "Junior was still asleep when I looked in a few minutes ago."

"That's no sign he's asleep now," she retorted acridly. "You know he generally wakes up by this time. You act as if I had some contagious disease. I never heard before that a fall was catching."

Her voice was before sarcastic, and I gave the laugh which she patiently expected at her sally.

"One never can tell about these things," I said demurely, starting for the door. "Medical science is making all sorts of new discoveries, you know. But I'll look at Junior again. If he's awake, I'll dress him and bring him in to you right away."

"That's something more like it," she commented grudgingly. "I was beginning to think that something was up which you didn't want me to know."

I bowed mentally to her intuition as I hurried into the room next door, where I had left Junior and Marion asleep. I dreaded infinitely the explanation to Mother Graham of the inflamed and blotched condition of her idolized grandson's face.

A Glorious Improvement.

I had left the room darkened, but when I entered the sun was streaming into windows to the top of which the shades had been sent, and Marion, perched upon the bed with Junior, was examining his face with a serious, knowing air, which would have done credit to any hospital nurse.

"Oh! Mama!" Junior's voice was a carol. "Those nasty old sores are most all gone away, and I don't burn any more."

"There are only a few tiny places left, really, Auntie Madge," Marion chimed in, raising her beautiful dark blue eyes, so like her mother's, to mine. "And they look more like mosquito bites than anything else."

I had my little lad in my arms by this time, and was carefully examining him, finding only confirmation of Marion's verdict. Mingled with my relief at seeing that the mysterious poison received at the beach had not injured him, was a newly-found hope that I could keep Mother Graham in ignorance of the whole episode. To do that, however, I must involve the children in the deception, and although it was a most innocent one, my conscience indulged itself in an uneasy qualm as I spoke warningly, distinctly:

"Junior, will you promise Mother something—word of honor?" I began, with the familiar formula which I have used with him ever since he has been able to understand anything.

"Usually his response is 'Yes, Mama, truly," but to my amazement and amusement, he scrambled to his feet, threw back his head and declaimed:

"Honest true, black and blue, cross my heart, hope to die, you bet your boots!"

"Oh! Junior!" Marion exclaimed with an annoyed maternal air, then she explained anxiously to me.

"That's a combination of Katie and Jerry Ticer," she said. "Of course he couldn't help but learn them, but I didn't think he'd say them to you."

"It doesn't matter, now," I told her in a low tone, then I turned to my small son, and addressed him again, knowing that Marion would take every detail of my admonition as her own.

"Junior, Granzie is sick," I said solemnly, impressively. "She fell down and hurt herself, and if we want her to get better, we mustn't let her worry about anything. Now if she knew that you had been hurt with those bad blotches on your face and body, she would worry, so you must not tell her anything about getting poisoned."

Junior looked at me steadily, evidently turning over the admonition in his mind.

"All right," he said finally, and then to my amazement added, "And if she says 'Richard Second, what are those awful things?'—indicating the small spots still on his face—I'll say: 'Skeeter bites, Granzie, can't you see?'"

"Oh, Junior!" I exclaimed reproachfully, wildly casting about for words in which to meet a situation I had never before been compelled to face with my little son, but he saved me the trouble.

"I don't want to hurt Granzie!" he said sturdily.

"But, remember, dear," I hastened to say, "the first minute Granzie is better you and I will tell her everything."

"Yes, Ma-ma," he said and I realized that he understood, and then he exclaimed:

"I want to see Granzie now! Take me to Granzie!"

Trinity Guild Fair.

Trinity guild of Trinity cathedral will hold its annual Christmas sale at 10:30 a. m. Saturday, December 13, at Orchard-Weihelm store. Mrs. George Johnston is in charge.

Frederic A. Leisen, son of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore A. Leisen, will be home on December 29 from Ann Arbor to spend the holiday season here.

My advice is to tell the young man you will go with him as long as he does not drink, but if you find he prefers to drink to your company you are going to give him up.

Your Problems

By Martha Allen

Her Beau Drinks.

Dear Miss Allen: The boy that I go with called me up one night and said he would not be able to see me because he had to go away on business. When he came he told me that he had told a lie. He said that he was out on a drunk and was afraid he would not be over it in time. He knew that I am opposed to his drinking. When I say anything about cutting him out of my life he says: "I'm not advocating frivolity, but just common sense. 'Dolling up' with good taste and due regard for the prevailing fashions will attract John's interest and increase his pride in your companionship."

Then when John marries you—for he will one day sooner or later unless you hide your real sweet self beneath a disguise of clumsy, ugly dowdiness—continue "dolling up."

Look always as freshly crisp and pretty—in bungalow apron at your housework, in smart suit for the street, in dainty evening frock—as "a great big, beautiful doll." By doing so you'll lose none of your womanliness, and you'll gain infinite admiration and love.

I WANT TO FURNISH MY LIVING ROOM IN KEEPING WITH MY PERSONALITY. WHAT KIND OF PIECES WOULD YOU SUGGEST?

OVER-STUFFED

These vital questions will be considered from the standpoint of interest in rational living and of devotion to the Christian ideal. You are invited to attend the services. We live in a new world, and we must learn to think its thoughts and use its knowledge.

"The Proper Study of Mankind Is Man"

"The Christian Religion and the New Psychology"

This subject will be discussed by Rev. Ralph E. Bailey in the following series of sermons, at the First Unitarian Church, 1111 Harney Street, Sundays, at 11 a. m.

Dec. 28—"Libido and the Ideal."

Doll Up of Course!

A girl wrote me a pathetic letter the other day. She has youth, ability, sterling character. Yet she can't hold the interest or love of men. She asked me why and enclosed a snapshot of herself to help my analysis. This photograph explained the reason.

Mary—as I shall call her—showed in her photograph a round, good-natured face with a bob unbecomingly out to accent that roundness. Some way, even in the photograph, Mary's face had a shiny look. Mary was clumsy—she leaned heavily on one foot. And she was obviously over-weight. Her frock—while doubtless neat and clean, was—well, just something for Mary to put on without regard to attractiveness or "chic."

My advice to Mary and all Marys—bless their hearts—who sigh for popularity and love, is: Doll up, Mary dear, and keep slim, fit and graceful. Not only at parties, but when you're Hosiery Hint.

Some of the expensive stockings now in use look faded after being washed. To avoid this appearance, use one teaspoonful of borax or a tablespoonful of turpentine to each two quarts of warm water. Use a limited amount of pure soap or soap flakes. Wash quickly and rinse thoroughly in clear water and hang out to dry where there is a draught of air.

The ladies of the Missionary society of the Lutheran Church of Our Redeemer, Twenty-fourth and Larimore streets, gave a luncheon at the church parlors, Friday, December 12.
