Your Problems by Martha Allen

A Hopeless Love. Dear Miss Allen: Can anything come between two who really care for one another?

At 16 I met a young man whom I admired greatly. I loved him from the first, and yet it was three long years before my dreams were realized. Then we became "sweethearts" and for a few months I was perfectly happy. But this did not last.

Two years have passed since he left me, but I still love him dearly. Occasionally he takes me out, but never will come into my home. Would he have given me up so easily if he really loved me? BETTY JANE.

Christmas Dinners

Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Coad will have 19 guests to dine with them at 5, Christmas afternoon.

A Wife's Confessional by Adele Garrison

The News Lillian's Letter Brought to Madge and Dicky.

"If you were younger," Dicky declared indignantly, "I'd smack you for snatching." "If I retorted saucily, "But I'll acknowledge I was rude. However, when a letter from Lillian is in question, all rules go by the boards. At that, sirrah, I'm not sure I ought not to be jealous of her writing to you in stead of me!"

"Yes, I can imagine you being jealous of old Lil," Dicky rejoined, as he closed the door and went down to the breakfast he evidently had interrupted to bring me the letter. His tone of absolute disbelief brought a reminiscent smile to my lips. Had he forgotten that there had been a time when Lillian's name was anathema to me? Then I reflected that I never had betrayed to him the full measure of my old feeling against the friend of his youth.

Lillian's keen eyes had seen it and her big brain and warm heart had at once set about the task of proving to me that my jealousy of her was had no reason for existence. So well had she succeeded that for all the years that have followed, Lillian—next to Dicky and Junior—has been closest to me of all the world. She is the beloved elder sister whom I never have had in the flesh, and I lean on her heavily in all life's emergencies.

Lillian's Assignment.

The letter was half out of the envelope, just as Dicky with his usual carelessness had thrust it back after reading it, and I drew it forth eagerly. There probably is no worse correspondent in the world than Lillian. She loathes writing letters and she never indites one if either the telegraph or the telephone will serve her purpose. But she was too far away for even her carelessness of expense to use a telephone, and she must have some message too lengthy for the wire.

I did not realize until I had opened the typewritten sheet—Lillian never uses the pen except for the most formal social notes with its characteristic caresses and interjections, how much I had missed her. For weeks she had been away upon one of her assignments from the government, usually given her only in grave emergency now at her own request. This time, however, Lillian had been summoned by my father, who, with surprisingly strength of mind and body, is engaged now more to one—he'll have it staged the very day I come in—he has a positive genius for picking the worst possible time for anything he does. So, Dicky-bird, will you kindly prod him with the toe of your newest boots and see that he gets busy right away? I must have the entire place swept and garnished, so that when I get in on Wednesday I can get directly to work, for I have a stack mountain high in front of me.

"Madge, kiss Marion for me, and if possibly can arrange it, bring her in with you to meet me Wednesday at the Grand Central at 2 o'clock. I can't wait to get her in my arms another minute after I get there, and I shall have to camp at the studio for a day or two; no chance of going directly to the farm, or I wouldn't ask it. And tell Mother Graham I've a story for her that beats the best melodrama she ever read. My best to you all—Lillian."

My mother-in-law smiled in voluntarily, then sighed. "I'm living melodrama of my own now, not reading it," she said dolefully.

"If you don't believe it, I'll show you!" —what Listerine does to onion odor

THEY had been reading a magazine advertisement about Listerine, the well-known antiseptic, and about its wonderful deodorizing power. It spoke of how Listerine removes onion odor and it challenged the reader to make this test:

"Rub a bit of fresh onion on your hand. Douse on a little Listerine. The onion odor immediately disappears."

She was skeptical and bet that it couldn't be done. He had seen it demonstrated before and set out to prove it to her. The girl lost her bet. But she gained a valuable bit of information.
