Your Problems

by Martha Allen

Chasm.

Dear Miss Allen: About two years ago I was married, and after living with my husband a few months was divorced. A year ago the 18th of November I was married again. Then my first husband caused me some trouble about my divorce and the law said that my last husband and I had to part until January while I went through another divorce case. When my second husband and I parted he told me I was single and to enjoy myself until the time came for us to be married again. A few nights ago I went to a dance with a couple of girl friends and he did not like it. I was not with a fellow, as I expect to marry him again. The next morning he came to the house and would not speak to me. He left without saying goodby or when he would be back. I thought he would leave town, and so I have looked all over town for him and have failed to find him. Would you advise me to wait for him and to marry him when he does come back? Would you advise me to marry any one so jealous? I love the man and I know that he loves me.

BROKEN-HEARTED WOMAN. The man you married last will always have to face the fact that you gave up your first husband for him, and therefore jealousy on his part will not be entirely without warrant. If he comes back, and he probably will since he loves you, be tactful and kind so that his jealous fits will not be provoked and intensified. Under the circumstances it was hardly wise to attend the dance even in the company of girls.

Love at Thirteen.

Dear Miss Allen: I am a girl of 13. For two years I have cared very much for a boy four years my senior. He does not like girls older than I. He does not know that I care so much for him. At first we played together like children, but things have changed. I care for him more than as a friend now. I am nearly sure that he cares for me because when he is around me he acts like it. Can you advise me how to find out if he cares for me or not? Also tell me what to do to let him know that I care for him.

WAITING. You will have to judge how much the young man cares for you by his actions. Both you and he are too young to talk of love and marriage. Do not try to make him tell you that he cares, and by no means confess your love for him. It is enough to let him know you value him as a friend.

Dear Martha Allen: I am a girl of 17 and have been going with a boy one year my senior. About a month ago we had a quarrel and I thought I would give him the privilege of never coming back, and so I returned his letters. Now I am sorry I did so and he also acts differently. Is it my place to make up? If so, should I write or speak to him. SORRY.

Do not make up with an apology. Simply speak as if nothing had hap-

A Wife's Confessional by Adele Garrison

Marion's Emotions Become a Bit Entangled.

For the second time within 10 minutes I found myself unable to answer promptly a question propounded to me by Marlon Morton, Lillian Underwood's adorable young daughter. But there was a vast difference between the queries in their effect upon me. In telling Marlon that I did not know whether her mother would find happiness in marrying Robert Savarin, I had experienced no emotional reaction save disappointment that I could not give her a definite answer. But her query as to which I loved better, Dicky or Junior, shook me to my very soul.

Glibly I had told Marlon that "there's something wrong with that mother who doesn't love her children best of all the world." I had believed my own statement, too, until the child's puzzled question, making concrete application of my theory, tore open the secret places of my heart as an explosive blast might have done.

What I found there astounded me. Ever since I felt the first clutch of my baby's clinging fingers, I have lived for him, put his comforts, his demands before those of any one else, and, rejoicing in Dicky's devotion to his small son, I have arranged my household gods in the order sponsored by so many women—children first, parents a decided second.

But something more powerful than even love of children—something primitive, savage—leaped in my heart at Marlon's probing and found voice upon my lips. "Dicky is My Mate."

"Dicky is my man, my mate," I found myself murmuring insistently. "There can be no one dearer to me than he."

Then, as I saw Marlon's wide wondering eyes upon me, I pulled myself together sharply, thankful that the words had been but a murmur.
