RESERVATIONS FOR SLEEPING BEAUTY

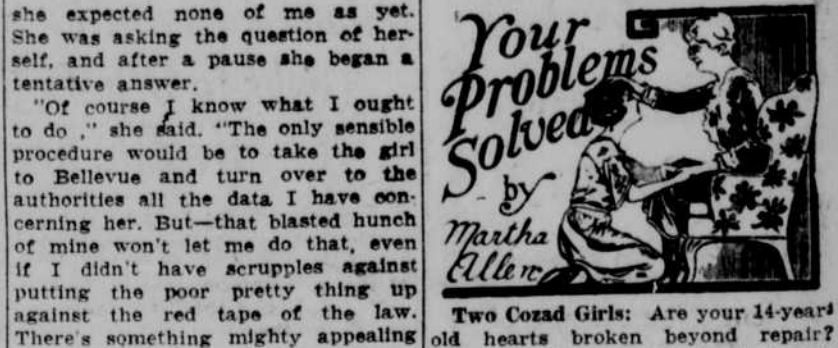

THE WEDDING

The Sleeping Beauty sat up slowly, feeling very much dazed. She looked at the prince and thought him just as handsome as he thought her beautiful. At the same time that she awoke, so did every one else in the palace. The page went with his tune, the dog finished a growl, and the lady in waiting went on with her sewing. They weren't changed at all by their hundred year nap and never dreamed they had been asleep. They found out all about it later. As for the prince, he sent to his own castle for his royal purple robe of state trimmed with golden fringe and tassels. He and the beautiful princess were married right then and there, and the dog fairy appeared to act as bridesmaid. Then, with her magic wand, she furnished them with the most wonderful wedding feast that was ever seen. And every one was so happy that they decided that the wicked old witch's spell had turned out for the best, after all.

A Wife's Confessional by Adele Garrison

"Why Not the Farm?" said Lillian to Lillian's Dilemma. There isn't a distinguishing mark of any kind anywhere on the clothes in this trunk," I assured Lillian. "Nor is there in the suitcase," she said. "I've been through it. What else do you notice about this job?" I hesitated only for an instant at Lillian's question, for I was very sure she was anticipating my answer, that she had deduced what I had from the collection of clothing in the trunk and suitcase of her mysterious protegee. "Two things," I answered. "There's not a single article there that's ever been used, everything is fresh from the shops—and I think they were all selected by a man." "Of course," she rejoined. He's consulted some fool budget in a woman's magazine about the articles which should comprise a feminine wardrobe, and then gone to some store which hasn't its own mark on it's goods, and told some saleswoman a cock and bull story about a daughter going to school or something like that. Can't you see the girl unloading that silk dress and those hats on him? They'd probably been in the store since Eve began to sit up and take notice." "All of that," I agreed, smiling at her vehemence. "But—his lack of sartorial taste didn't hamper the rest of his job."

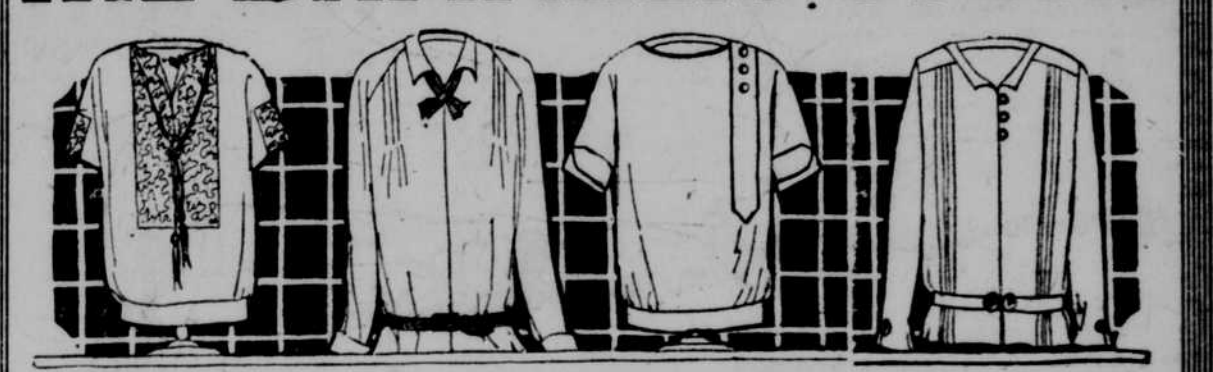

she expected none of me as yet. She was asking the question of herself, and after a pause she began a tentative answer. "Of course I know what I ought to do," she said. "The only sensible procedure would be to take the girl to Bellevue and turn over to the authorities all the data I have concerning her. But—that blasted bunch of mine won't let me do that, even if I didn't have scruples against putting the poor pretty thing up against the red tape of the law. There's something mighty appealing about her, don't you think so?" "Yes, I felt it," I answered, but Lillian noticed my answer only with a nod and went on rapidly with her monologue. I knew that she was using me as dressmakers formerly availed themselves of wire models. My attention was drawn by her mental arguments pro and con. The only service I could render her was to be a silent but eager auditor. "It's lucky that I don't have to render any account of my dealings with her to any authority," she went on, while I mentally commented that service of the government gave her latitude of action which might be dangerous in the hands of many women. "It enables me to take her anywhere I wish, but where that's the question, I can't keep her in a place like this, the studio is impossible, and the farm equally so. At last I saw my chance to help, and my desire to aid Lillian was bolstered by my own odd hunch, concerning the mysterious girl, as I answered quietly. "Why not the farm?" (Copyright, 1925.)
