

Today

Mussolini's Illness. Man's Greatest War. British Security. The Queen Bobs Her Hair.

Wild rumors are cabled from Italy concerning the illness of Premier Mussolini, who is ill.

Another rumor says the Italian crown prince shot Mussolini in a quarrel. That's nonsense, undoubtedly, and it would be base ingratitude.

Another story bestows upon Mussolini a case of blood poisoning caused by a scratch from his pet lion.

Science says the greatest battle of the human race is to be against insects and microscopic germs.

Those tiny enemies do infinitely more harm than ever was done by all the wild beasts and poisonous reptiles that men have gradually conquered.

The influenza germ that prostrates you today, and kills you when it finds its way through the sinus cavity into the brain is older than civilization.

In former times it has been infinitely more deadly than toward the end of the great war, when it killed about 8,000,000 people.

However, man having destroyed the mammoth and the rhinoceros, when he had only a sharpened flint to work with, will know how to overcome his insect and microbe foes with all science working for him.

Recent discovery of a disinfectant harmless to man, yet 50 times more powerful than carbolic acid, means more to the really important war of the human race than any discovery of T. N. T. or poison gas.

The important war is the war against disease.

Mr. Chamberlain of the British cabinet sends a notice to the entire diplomatic force of the British Empire to this effect: "Number One: And far ahead of all other things in British policies stand British security. Everything else is unimportant compared with that."

Sentimental Americans that would have this country enter the League of Nations as a world curial, will please think over this passage from Austen Chamberlain's memorandum.

"The only possible British policy is to consult the British interests, leaving the League of Nations, at some future time, to develop into an instrument of international peace."

The American policy is to consider American interests.

The queen of Belgium bobbed her hair, and there is much excitement. Kings and queens take up new ideas cautiously.

MISSING FARMER NOW IN COLORADO

Kentley, March 3.—The search for Gabriel Shada, 60, who disappeared a week ago, was ended today, when a message was received stating that he was working on a farm near Iliff, Colo.

The sender of the message left little doubt as to identification of the Buffalo county farmer, and a brother and a son left immediately for Iliff. Mr. Shada left after making repeated threats of suicide, because of financial reverses and fear that he might lose one of his farms by foreclosure of an existing mortgage.
