The American Federation of Labor at Minneapolis

Last week the editor of The Wage-worker had the pleasure of attending several sessions of the American Federation of Labor convention at Minneapolis, and of meeting personally several of the noted labor leaders of the country—Samuel Gompers, Frank Morrison, John Mitchell, Charles Dold, Congressman-elect Wilson, Timothy Healey, E. Gerry Brown, and others too numerous to mention.

The chief purpose of the editor's visit was to extend to the Federation an invitation to hold its 1907 meeting in Lincoln. By courtesy of President Gompers and the convention he was given the floor just before the noon adjournment on Saturday, and presented the claims of Lincoln. The letters of invitation signed by Governor Mickey, Mayor Brown and Mr. Bryan were loudly applauded, and by direction of the president were ordered placed on the records of the convention. Had Lincoln been represented at the beginning of the convention by two or three good hustlers, backed by the advantages offered, there is little doubt that the convention could have been launched. As it was, Jamestown, with the attraction of the exposition, was on the ground from the start and had secured the inside track before any other city was mentioned. The Lincoln delegate was given a warm reception by the convention, and was assured that the claims of this city would be given careful consideration. If the Lincoln Commercial Club had taken hold of the matter in the right spirit when the matter was first called to its attention, Lincoln would have been a sure winner. That was generally conceded by the many delegates with whom the Lincoln representative conversed.

Right here, is just the proper place to correct an erroneous report sent out by the Associated Press from Minneapolis last week. It was in effect that the delegates to the American Federation of Labor had by a vast majority after a careful canvas, endorsed Theodore Roosevelt for president again in 1908.

There's nothing to it. The editor of The Wage-worker was one of the delegates interviewed, and his answer was about the same as that of the other delegates. This is the way it was done:

"I represent the Minneapolis Daily Bladder, and we are taking a poll of the delegates to ascertain how they stand on the question of President Roosevelt being a candidate for reelection in 1908. Would you care to be quoted on this matter?"

That is what the gentlemanly young reporter would spring on the delegate, and this is about what the reply would be:

"O, Roosevelt's all right, I guess." And upon that sore of a foundation was builded the Associated Press report that the delegates to the American Federation of Labor convention had endorsed President Roosevelt for another term.

Doubtless you have seen in the daily papers a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of organized labor with President Gompers' political policy. It is all in the newspapers. If we are able to understand symptoms, President Gompers will be backed up in his policy by an overwhelming vote. The opposition will be confined to the socialist element and to a few men whose unionism is always subservient to some political influence.

On every hand was heard expression of regret that Hearst was defeated in New York. "Organized labor stood by Hearst," declared Timothy Healey, of New York. "The man who denies that statement does not know what he is talking about. The vote shown in New York was beaten by a combination of boodle, dishonesty, 'high finance' and treachery in the democratic camp. Organized labor stood solid."

One of the most prominent delegates was Miss Mary McDowell, of Chicago, representing the Women's Trades Union League. She addressed the convention Saturday morning and made a strong plea to the men to assist in the work of organizing the women workers of the country.

It was an inspiration to meet the stalwart workers in the cause of unionism. The interest manifested at Minneapolis is an indication that the cause is progressing.
