Breaking Him Up

By Nellle Cravey Gillmore.

(Copyright, by Daily Story Pub. Co.) Mrs. Marsden had arrived at the conclusion that beroic measures would have to be resorted to.

It was a dreary, sun-forgotten morning. Spasmodic gusts of sleet pelted the window-panes and the wind cried shudderingly through the naked branches of the trees. Mrs. Marsden came down to breakfast a little late. She looked a good deal troubled and her cheeks were pale. There was a suggestion of sleeplessness about the dull, inflamed eyes.

Her husband glanced up from the newspaper he was reading with the customary perfunctory nod. Something in his wife's face chained his attention a second.

'What is the matter?" he asked. Without meeting his glance, she replied:

"Jack was restless all night; a bit feverish, i'm afraid. I think you'd better speak to the doctor and have him stop by this morning."

The paper dropped listlessly from Marsden's hands; the boy was his idol. Throughout the meal, he dallied idol. Throughout the meal, he danied with his coffee, pushing aside all food that was set before him. At the conclusion of the meal, he rose abruptly and ran upstairs to the nursery. The child was asleep now, but his cheeks were almost too vividly pink and the breath was coming through his dry, scarlet lips in little labored jerks. He did not hesitate, but went at once to the telephone and called up the family physician.

In half an hour the doctor came, making a careful examination of the patient. it was nothing serious, he thought; nothing, at least, to occasion alarm at present. There was considerable temperature with a slightly irritated throat, but the child would be better as soon as the prescribed medicines were administered. Marsden remained until this was done and the boy had gone off into a quiet doze.

With his hand on the front door

"A note for you, Dick." One of the men had taken it from the messenger and thrust it into his hands. Marsden took it mechanically and jammed it into his pocket-and forgot it. When things had quieted a bit, and he had returned to his private office, he recollected and pulled out the note, breaking the seal in a sort of daze. He glanced at the handwriting a trifle impatiently at first. But suddenly his eyes swam red. A little hoarse cry caught in his throat and he turned ashen. Jack very ill-perhaps dying-perhaps dead! He did not wait to read the letter through, but with a groan turned and tore his way through the congested throngs that packed about the doors

He forgot that there had ever existed such a thing as copper; Wall street faded into oblivion. When he reached the house an ominous stillness reigned outside and in. His knees shook under him as he staggered up the stairs. With his trembling fingers on the doorknob he stood panting for breath, fearing to open the door. But after a minute he controlled himself and went in. The child was sitting on the floor, playing with some toys. The nurse was darning in a corner and Kathleen was nowhere in evidence. "Jack!"

Marsden's relief was so great that he sank into a chair, his breath almost sobbing through his white lips. He was perfectly limp after the strain of the past hour, but every other emotion was swallowed up in the feeling of in tense thankfulness that enveloped him. When he had collected himself sufficiently, he spoke:

"Where is your mistress, Zella?" He turned to the maid.

'She went out, saying she would be back in time for luncheon,"

"But she-she sent me a note, did she not?"

"Yes, sir; I think she did." Marsden pondered the situation bewilderedly, a slow light forcing its way on his brain. It was probably a mere device, a trick of Kathleen's to break him up in the Street. He had explained to her that it would be impossible for him to stay at home at this particular time and she-this was her-revenge! Tears, reproaches, threats-she had meted them out in plenty to carry her point, and failing, she had deliberately essayed this last -outrage. Well, she had succeeded at last. His summary absence at the most critical period had doubtless lost him his last penny. This recalled him to the necessity for immediate action, and he rose and went to the telephone and rang up his brokers. It was as he had thought. It was too late now to cover; everything had been swept away by the rapid break in prices.

A curious feeling of revulsion sud denly came over Marsden. If, indeed, Kathleen cared so deeply as all this, then why not reconcile himself to the life of toil that, in his penniless state, stretched inevitably before him? After all, perhaps life in its simpler solution, held much greater joys than he knew!

Presently a door opened downstairs Steps approached and in another moment the nursery door was thrown open.

Mrs. Marsden came in nervously very pale, her dark eyes shrinking from her husband's quick glance. FIRST BASE HARD There was a transitory hurt look in his face, but he accused her by neither word nor gesture. She paused half way across the floor. Her eyes were bright, her lips beginning to quiver.

GIANT BULGARIAN WRESTLER

YUSIFF MAHMOUT

Since his arrival in America some time ago, this big Bulgarian wrestler has not lost a match and he is consid ered one of the best foreign wrestlers who ever visited this country. Close students of the game declare he is a worthy foe of Frank Gotch, the world's champion.

ner to suit Dreyfuss is shown by the fact that Abstein, the Providence first baseman, is slated for the job for this year. Gill had a perfect fielding average, but batted only .224.

Thus in four seasons the Pirates have experimented with more first basemen than any of the American league clubs has in six years, seven being the American league record for first basemen since the league has been composed as at present.

Cleveland and Washington are the leaders, each having had seven men on the initial sack exclusive of men who have been shifted to that position for a few games as the result of accidents which necessitated a shift. Cleveland had Hickman, Schwartz, Carr and Stovall in 1904, Stovall and Rossman in 1906, Stovall and Lister in 1907 and Stovall, Hickman and Hinchman in 1908, the last two only being sent to first on account of in-Washington started off with Bill Clarke and Carey in 1903, while Jake Stahl and Clarke turned the trick in 1904. Since then, Hickman Altizer, Anderson, Blankenship and Freeman have worked on the first cushion for he Nationals.

Ganzel, Anderson, Chase, Moriarity and Stahl have been the New York first base guardians, while Detroit has een forced to call on Carr, Hickman, Beville, Crawford, Lindsay and Rossman, Isbell, Dolan, Donohue and Anderson have been the only ones that Chicago has been cailed upon to use, while St. Louis has been content with Anderson, Tom Jones, Sugden and Hawy Davis is practically the only regular first baseman the Athletics have had since they entered the league. Seybold subbed for 16 games in 1903, while Mullin played 26 games there in 1904. Shreck and Powers have also subbed there a little, but Davis has been the only regular.

Five first basemen have been found necessary for Boston. La Chance served there in 1903 and 1904, while Lewis Tewanima, the youthful Hopi student at the Carlisle Indian school, has jumped into fame in the last year because of his remarkable long-distance running. He came to the Carlisle school two years ago, with 11 other Hopis or Moqui Indians, from Grimshaw and "Buck" Freeman were the regulars during the next two Marathon in London, Tewanima, who dently suffered agonies throughout the race, came in ninth. knob he paused. Kathleen came down hursdedly and laid her fingers with a little pleading gesture on his arm There were tears on her lashes.

"Don't go just yet," she asked him: somehow-I feel unaccountably anxious, notwithstanding the doctor's assurances.

Marsden was silent a moment. When he spoke his voice was gentler than usual.

"Til come back as soon as I possibly can," he said, "but It is out of the question for me to stay at home this morning. You are unnecessarily worried, I thiak. Perhaps you'd better take a little rest yourself.'

She half-opened her lips to speak, but reconsidering, turned away without so much as a word. Marsden followed her with his eyes, almost wistfully. Her gesture, the atmosphere of her conveyed an unmistakable sense of irritation, of reproof.

Out in the open air, apprehension died from the father's mind. His brief uneasiness was quite lost in the contemplation of the stirring day before him. It was not the first time he had hung almost his last dollar on the caprice of some promising stock. He had begun the struggle in Wall street a comparatively poor man. During a 20-years' career there, he had man- crisis. I threw down everything. aged to make several fortunes-and lose them. There had always been a little left in the family exchequer with which to start over again, and in no case had he hesitated to use it. But to-day would mark a crisis. He had plunged every cent into this copper deal and if he did not come out with flying colors he would come out a bankrupt.

When he turned into the Street, scores of familiar faces greeted him cordially on all sides. For Marsden had long been a power on 'Change.

Excitement was rife. He flung himself into the thick of it like a drunken. man. Hours passed. He forgot everything. He knew nothing, saw nothing, was conscious of nothing-save Copper!

In the midst of the tumult a man pushed his way through the crowds to where Marsden stood with strained ears, blood-shot eyes and shaking hands waiting for the rapidly ap-proaching crisis. Would the stock hold or-if prices broke-

"Dick!" she said, penitently, "Dick, forgive me!" For a space he made no answer, and she bent forward, clasping her hands. "I was mad, beside myself," she hurriedly on in little gasping way, "mad to think there was nothing could take you away from-from that; not for a single day-not for a single hour! Ia devil entered my heart-I was determined to-" Her voice trailed off to a whisper, and she stopped, breathing hard. She shook from head to foot.

Marsden rose and laid an affection ate hand across her shoulder, drawing her over to him.

"Never mind, little girl," he said; "I'm afraid that I haven't always treated you just fair and right in my blind selfishness. And in the long run I am the more to blame. But we'll start life all over again-in earnest. All these things will have to go, of course, but we are both young and -we have each other. I am strong enough to do any sort of work-

"What do you mean?" She had fallen back, her hand going to her throat as though she felt stifled. He looked at her in perplexity, his eyes clouding.

"Why, it is quite clear, isn't it? 1 had to leave right in the midst of a did not even think to arrange with anyone about protecting my stock. The boy was dying, as I thought-as your words led me to believe. God! what was money-what was anything -compared to our child?"

The face she lifted to him was convulsed with passion.

"You-you left there with everything you had at stake? Is that what you mean?" Her voice was hoarse, strained. "Exactly." A suddenly vacant look had come into Marsden's eyes.

She burst into a wild laugh. The words fairly hissed through her clamped teeth:

"And you-you are my husband!" She stamped the floor with her foot.

A dazed moment went by. When Marsden looked up, even his lips were white. His eyes were sunken and into them had come the tragedy of years. "Kathleen!"

But only her quick, angry footsteps sounding along the polished corridor. answered him.
