The great strike in Russia was called off at the solicitation of Count Witte. It was called for the purpose of supporting the Polish rebellion and of obtaining quickly the liberties promised by the government to the Russian people. The strikers agreed that the strike would again be called if the government failed to keep its promises and that a series of strikes would follow until the people received full liberty. It is said that the government promised that if the strike was immediately brought to an end the soldiers and sailors who mutinied at Cronstadt would be forgiven.

Between 100 and 120 lives were lost by the wrecking of the St. Hilda, a cross channel steamer, near Jardin lighthouse, off the north coast of France, in a snow storm. Against their frantic efforts to escape the fire fighters actually had to fight for admission.
