unaccustomed to, so good springs and a good mattress should be selected. In the guest room we should advise using something other than the plain white bedspread. There are many pretty materials in silkline, dotted swiss, or white bob-net lace can be used over colors. These are righter and more attractive looking than the plain white materials. But more appropriate than the beauty of the bed is comfort. There should be a place in the closet for clothing and also some room in the drawers for toilet articles and little necessities. The mirror should be placed in as light a place as possible. It would be decidedly rude not to provide towels and matches for this room. The guest naturally spends some little time in the room, so materials for writing, such as stamps, stationery, etc., should be in readiness. Make this room as bright and cheerful looking as any other part of the house so that it will not have a stiff appearance. Allow freedom, so that the guest will, in the truest sense, feel welcome.

Uses of Stale Bread

With proper management there is little need of much waste of bread, but at times some will become hard. Slices left from the table may be neatly placed on a plate and used for toast, or they may be cut into little cubes and set in the oven to brown and then put away in a closed can. These are delicious with cream soups, or pleasing additions to a chicken gravy in place of dumplings or biscuit. The small pieces left at the plates may be gathered up in a pan and thoroughly dried, then rolled up very fine and used for breading chops, covering croquettes, puddings, etc. Often times these small pieces can be made into very nice bread puddings. This is especially so on the farm where eggs and milk are plentiful. Again the pieces may be used for dressing served with fowl or with a pork roast. For pork, apple may be put in the dressing, which serves to give the meat a delicate flavor. Large pieces of stale bread may be moistened in a little milk or water to which has been added a beaten egg. It is then fried in a spider containing fat and served warm with brown syrup. If the rolled crumbs or croutons become damp, they should be put into a pan and set in the oven for a short time and thoroughly dried after which the crumbs may be put back into the jar.
