LABOR OPPOSES GOVERNMENT POWER

Advocates of government-subsidized hydro-electric projects use as one of their most persistent arguments the alleged benefits that will go to labor.

It is interesting to observe the viewpoint of a very aggressive labor leader—John L. Lewis, President of the United Mine Workers of America. At the recent meeting of the Appalachian Wage Conference in Washington, Mr. Lewis issued an ultimatum that the whole coal industry, miner and operator alike, will strenuously oppose further hydro-electric developments.

The outstanding fact in connection with hydro-electric development, Mr. Lewis said, is that the replacement of coal with water power is no longer considered on a basis of cost. That is true of Muscle Shoals, of Boulder Dam, of the St. Lawrence development—in no case will the change make it possible to operate more efficiently. Another example is the proposed Loup River project in Nebraska, which Mr. Lewis regards as being especially menacing. The Loup River has been repeatedly surveyed by private power companies and rejected as being basically inefficient and impractical.

To quote from Mr. Lewis on still another phase of the issue: "There is pending in the Senate a bill to create a Missouri Valley Authority which conveys the right of that Authority to construct hydro-electric plants at available sites on the Missouri River or any of its tributaries and about the only restriction is that they must build a dam on some point on those rivers where the water doesn't run up hill, and the bill proposes that the government of the United States shall write a blank check to finance those undertakings."

Mr. Lewis holds that such proposals as these are a threat to employment—they will destroy thousands of permanent jobs and substitute for them temporary jobs. The taxpayers money—millions of it—will have been used to build unnecessary electric plants to the destruction of private savings investments running into vast amounts, as well as throwing men out of work. It sounds like an incredible story. But it is true. And it shows what can happen when officialism and politics run rampant.

work on the walls, are to be seen now-a-days in the offices of doctors, lawyers, architects, and professional men generally. These modern furnishings are worth money, and have therefore gained the sympathetic interest of the burglar.

Office men have always been able to protect their possessions by insurance, but it required several different policies which meant they were compelled to pay the higher premium rates of merchants and others who had goods for sale.

At last the office men of the country who do not deal in articles of commerce are to be protected from the burglar or hold-up man by an insurance policy which not alone safeguards their office equipment, such as typewriters, art objects and rugs, but also covers the money and securities which come to them in the course of business, according to announcement by the National Bureau and Surety Underwriters.

They are protected from "kidnaping," where the victim is taken back to the office and compelled to open the safe; from holdups of employees either in the office or in the street; from safe burglary; from burglary into the premises; and at last for damage to their property resulting from a robbery or burglary, except by fire.

The rates vary in the four burglary rating territories of the United States.

FOUND DEAD FROM APOPLEXY STROKE

Mrs. L. W. Williams was found dead Saturday morning at the restaurant she has been conducting on east Garfield street, where she has been living alone since the death of her husband ten years ago.

The event was not unexpected, even by her, as she had had a previous stroke, which left her in not the best of health, causing her to caution her friends Mr. and Mrs. Harold Brown, living a couple of blocks away, "if you don't see anything stirring, come and investigate." Mr. Brown that morning saw her morning paper still in the front screen, and from the side of the house saw she had not slept in the bed in the bedroom. So he went to the rear of the house, finding that Mrs. Williams had fallen in the back entryway, which she used as a coal house, and was dead when he found her.

The coroner was called, as a safeguard, pronouncing it a plain case of death from apoplexy. Word was sent at once to her brother, Lewis Williams, living in Omaha.

Mrs. Williams was 70 years of age, so she remarked to a friend recently. She and her husband were prominent residents here up until his death Nov. 10, 1923 and Mrs. Williams has since then continued the restaurant business in a small way, having many friends.

The funeral services for Mrs. Williams have been set for this Monday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock from the Walker Funeral Home. Rev. W. M. Berry will be in charge. A brother, Louis Williams of Omaha has come for the services.
