Dark green taffeta, a color becoming to almost any complexion is used here for a dance frock. The wide skirt joins the low-waisted, fitted bodice with tiny pleats—color contrast is provided in rich red roses which trim one very full sleeve, and the opposite hemline. Good for dining and informal evenings is this black bengaline skirt of modified fullness, with a separate top of copper satin, this with bustle. Vary the skirt by adding different dressy blouses or evening tops.

Gets S. S. to Adopt Negro Books in Elementary School

By KORAC A BATTLE ROYAL

The Indian pivoted instinctively as Leo held the spear menacingly close against the warrior's back. Immediately the Inca soldiers closed in upon Leo as he leaped out of their way behind the bewildered king's throne. "Watch it!" warned Records. "They're coming up behind you from the left entrance!" Just as John Records finished speaking, two very tough-looking guardsmen rushed up the steps toward him. The American's solid-leather woodman shoe connected hard upon the foremost Inca's jaw! Almost at once the Indian tottered dazedly on the steps; then a split-second later he toppled over in a heap, blocking his companion's mad rush forward! As Records turned to the throne where Leo was busily engaged toasting about several very stubborn adversaries, he was greatly annoyed to see that the majority of the soldiers were now concentrating their forces for the purpose of rushing the Americans in an organized manner. By this time the columns of Indians were approaching the narrow records in steady, army fashion. Records' fist swung around and around very much like a fast revolving windmill! Once, twice, three times and then almost continuously the heavy hammer-head blows felled over-anxious Inca warriors! But the soldiers continued the ascent; there were too many warriors for one man to battle. In a final, desperate effort, Records grabbed one of the Indians who had jumped to the top of the royal steps; with a straining pull, he lifted the heavy man bodily over his head and then flung the Inca mightily into the pursuing mass of fighting men! Then, taking full advantage of the momentary pause in the miniature battle, Records managed to reach Leo's side in time to see Zaner push an unfortunate Inca warrior into the circular hall—fifty feet below!

Columbia, S. C. Sept. 14 —(By L. M. A. Myers for ANP)—South Carolina State Department of Education has adopted Negro books for the first five grades in elementary schools. The books were written by noted Negro authors. The list was approved after some study by a committee of selection of states adopted books upon suggestion of Miss Thomas, state supervisor of elementary education. She is a ranking member of the department of education of South Carolina.

The whole matter of placing Negro books in the public school list is due to the credit of a Negro school teacher in the Allendale school at Allendale, S. C. Little is known of this young woman, for she works in a small town. But she is one person who is interested in the development of her race. Her name is Hilda V. Grayson. While attending school, she was convinced of the importance of the story of the Negro race reaching the ears of the boys and girls of her race. She said, "They will see the possibility of rising in spite of all handicaps."

So intent was this young teacher in her beliefs that she was permitted to present her story to 5,000 members of the Palmetto S. Teachers association. At its last session in March, she directed a history group which was a credit to her race. With her own means, she gathered and arranged a program which placed emphasis on Negro life. This included methods of presenting the material, use of Negro music and literature in schools. Included in this program was an exhibit long to be remembered by the 1,100 persons visiting the group. In the exhibit were over 50 Negro journals, more than 100 pictures of leaders, and 20 very good displays from various schools showing the progress made by Negroes in So. Carolina and America. Among the Most of us stop before a full length mirror before setting out on an important date, starting to work or merely doing the family marketing. We make sure that our hair is neatly and attractively arranged, that our lipstick is carefully applied, that our powder and rouge blend with the skin tone and harmonize with the colors we are wearing. But how many of us do an "about face?" Although a good actress seldom turns her back to the audience, in the ordinary routine of our days we would literally have our back to the wall if we would avoid "rear vision" scrutiny. But, unfortunately, many of us go blithely on our way with such the same attitude as the ostrich—if we can't see the back of our hair, the hem of our dress, the seams of our stockings, neither can anyone else. All of which, of course, is absurd.

Beware of Run-Down Heels Last week I suffered a grim disillusionment while talking to a charming, seemingly well-groomed girl. She was beautifully dressed, amusing to talk to, and I noticed that several of the young men in the room were eyeing her with interest. And then she turned her back! Her heels were scuffed and run over, an item which in itself marked her as careless and lazy. Had she waited for ten minutes at the corner shoe repair shop she could have started out on a better footing. Twisted Seams Taboo She was wearing the sheers of sheer stockings, obviously her dress-up hose, but the seams were so twisted and off-center that I was conscious of nothing but the grotesque effect they gave her legs. Nothing, that is, except two tufts of slip which hung below the hem of her dress. Someone should have told her years ago that she should have all her slips two inches shorter than her hemline to avoid just such a misfortune. She was wearing a blouse and skirt, a lovely dainty blouse which from the front made her look truly feminine. But in the back, alas, they had earlier in the day decided to part company and the blouse dangled simply over the skirthead like a flag at half-mast. The hair at the back of her head presented a startling contrast to the shining curls around her face. It was apparently intended to be a smooth roll but innumerable strands had come loose and hung over her collar, giving the final touch of careless grooming. When she turned again to face the young men, their admiring glances were gone.

And the moral of all this is self-evident. Remember that there are two sides to everything. Don't overlook the one you can't see.

Hits Wall St. Control Of Press, and Radio. Let's Coughing, Oct. Sept. 14 (CNA)—"The central problem of political opinion in the democracies is how to take the power of control of public thought away from the barons of industry," Dr. Max Lerner, professor of political economy at Williamstown College, asserted here this week. Dr. Lerner suggested that the American people, through its government, should own some radio stations and newspapers.

Low Down from HICKORY GROVE

Here a while back, I got a scribbling about women in business and the ones who could maybe put the shot or manage a plumbing shop and how most fellers were scared of 'em and married the gals who are an artist on pie design versus being a go-getter. And a gal in Minnesota, she happened to read what I was poppin' off about and she wrote me, and I was glad to hear from her—and maybe I could help her. But she is not the kind I was writing about before. Her problem s't considerable. And I reckon he is maybe kinda over-doing it. is a 6-foot husband who likes to But instead of sitting, this duck he might be the galavanting type which is not so hot either. As it is, the lady, she knows where to find the old boy. And if I was to hand out advice on how to manage a husband, I would say it is no different from training a polar bear—throw him an occasional fish versus the rolling pin—and in one week you won't know the old pelican. Yours with the low down, JO SERRA
