WHERE CITY STREETS BLOOM

Dy ANN JOYCE

A florist's shop is like an oasis in a city. Here town and country meet. The jaded passerby is refreshed by the sight of roses and trailing vines. Thoughts of tired business men turn for a moment from offices to rural scenes and flower filled gardens. Though but temporary the change is an uplift and a relief.

Every neighborhood that has a florist nearby is fortunate. Besides the (beauty of the colorful show windows, hich in itself is an asset worth considering, there is the practical side.

There are so many occasions when nothing else can quite take the place of flowers to express one's thoughts and feelings. And among all the lovely flowers that bloom there are always some that are more appropriate than others. The high-class florist makes it his business to know just which ones these are.

There is the little basket cradle that is often sent to welcome the new baby. If the little newcomer is a boy florist knows that the cradle should be filled with blue forget-menots or other small blue flowers. A little girl baby has pink flowers in her basket, generally tiny pink rosebuds. For the sweet girl graduate the florist suggests any gay flowers available. Roses are first choice, American Beauties being favorites or the more colorful talisman roses.

Red roses the florist tries to keep on hand for ardent youths to send to their lady loves. Red roses are lovers' favorites, perhaps the depth of color expressing the depth of their regard. The supreme achievement of the florist is the shower bouquet for the bride. No amateur can accomplish this feat successfully and no bride's costume seems quite complete without it. Also for a church wedding it is the florist who knows best how to decorate the church, where to place the palms and how to arrange the altar.

The little old-fashioned bouquets of debutantes are another of his achievements that no one else can equal.

He knows, too, that a sick child will get more joy out of a box of pansies than from most other flower gifts. Each pansy represents a tiny face and will give no end of entertainment to the little patient.

In sickness he suggests to his customers the flowers most appropriate to the condition of the invalid. Some flowers have too strong a perfume for very sick persons and he can advise which would be best in such cases.

If the patient's illness is not serious he is likely to suggest a box of mixed flowers which will give the sick one delightful occupation in arranging and rearranging them. A suitable vase of clear glass is often included with the flowers to make the gift

In times of bereavement no one knows so well as the florist how to mitigate in part the sorrow of the bereaved by the sympathetic influence of flowers. They bring with them loving thoughts which assure those in trouble that they are not alone in their grief.

For dinner parties exquisite centerpieces will be made up in the colors and for the price the hostess wishes. During football season chrysanthemums of many colors will fill the florist's window to help the girl friends of the players celebrate in true collegiate form.

On St. Patrick's Day green carnations will be there in honor of the good old saint.

Florists are first of all flower lovers and they recognize all other flower lovers as kindred souls. Often the exquisite arrangements of the shop winlows are masterpieces; for the artistic emperament seems to be a part of the successful florist's make-up.

And the perfume! How it floats out from within to cheer everyone who passes. How much joy and mental relief these oases in the streets give to city dwellers is difficult to calcuate. But they do help to brighten ordid lives. So blessings on the lower shops that gladden the city
