COMMITTEE ON UNAMERICAN ACTIVITIES.....

1. "One of the first acts of the New House of Representatives in Washington was to give permanent basis to the Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities. . . . It is to be hoped that a new chapter will now begin. Under Dies. . . it was one of the rankest travesties on a laudable purpose ever perpetrated by a law-making body. The committee can become a useful adjunct of the House, if it will. Certainly there is enough material for it to work on, and if it cooperates with professional peace and law enforcement groups it may do some good." (Detroit Free Press, January 5, 1945)

2. "It is encouraging that Rep. Rankin, who succeeded in creating the committee on un-American activities as a permanent body of the house, has seen his way to accept membership on the committee. . . . It is particularly reassuring. . . for the Democratic majority of the house, dominated by the left wing influence of the CIO's political action committee, has packed the committee with four men apparently selected on the basis of their disapproval of the committee's purposes. All four voted against the ceation of the committee, and their appointment to it demonstrated the New Deal's intention to sabotage its effectiveness." (Chicago Tribune, January 20, 1945).

3. "The decisive vote of the House of Representatives establishing the Committee on Un-American Activities as a permanent investigating body, marks an auspicious beginning for the new Congress. This committee. . . has always been strenuously opposed by the New Deal Administration, but has nevertheless always achieved extension of its authority. However, its temporary status was always suspended over it in the manner of a Damoclean sword. And it enemies within the administration had confidently expected to lower the blade on it this time for keeps. In hat sense, of course, the action of the new Congress is an administration defeat. . . This is particularly true because the Administration had planned not only the death of the committee but at least the suppression and probably the destruction of its records. The scope of this conspiracy only recently came to light, when it was disclosed in Washington that the chief investigator for the committee was refused a draft deferment in the face of a formal request for it by the Joint Congressional Deferment Committee. . . The Dies Committee had spent many years in assiduous investigation of subversive activities in the United States, which was the task assigned to it by Congress. As a result of its investigations, it had accumulated voluminous evidence of subversive activity. In its records are more than one million names of individuals and organizations against whom there was either evidence or testimony of subversive activity, affiliation or sympathy. . . The committee has not only been continued, but has been given permanent status. Its valuable records have been kept intact. The prestige and authority of the American Congress have been upheld. The vital interest of the American people have been restored." (Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph, January 17, 1945).
