C. N. O.—I have been going with a woman for 17 years and I really love her. For the past ten years I have been trying to get her to marry me but she says she won't every marry again. She is good, kind and considerate of me at all times. I treat her as kindly as it is possible for me to do so. I want to marry her and I want some suggestions please. She gets furious if she sees me talk with another woman but otherwise she is always sweet.

Ans: You haven't a rival competing against for this lady's hand so it is up to you to put on more pressure and persuade her to change her mind. The home you are building has her completely charmed and the fact that she is giving orders about the arrangements and other incidentals indicates that she has her heart set on living there. Right now would be the strategic moment to try to win her. Get busy boy!

L. S. W.—I read your column regularly and think the best of it. I am in love with a married woman and know she is in love with me. I have been married but am separated from my wife. Should we both get our divorces and marry? She's the only girl I have ever loved.

"Everything For The Home"

Ans: You are separated from your mate and you could get a divorce without bringing grief to her but the lady in question has an entirely different setup. You should not encourage her to leave her husband. You were wrong to romance while still married. She couldn't possibly know what decision to make under the present circumstances. Clear out of the picture for awhile and let her get her wits together and make a decision.

B. N. C.—I finished high school this year. My father is well able to send me to college this fall but he tells mother and I that he will not spend one cent for this cause. My aunt, dad's sister, is very anxious for me to go to college and says she will finance my education. Should I accept her generosity?

Ans: Nothing would please your aunt any more than for you to accept her offer. She would love to have you as her guest in her fine home while giving you the benefit of a college education. For your own reference, why not keep an accurate account of the money your aunt spends on your education so that you may repay her later on if you so desire.

V. W.—My husband and I are separated and divorced. He started coming back and staying here part of the time and last week he went away for a few days. Now I am wondering if I should marry him again or look for someone else.

Ans: Apparently neither of you were happy over the divorce else you would not be trying to live together again. Take him back if you love him, but get married before you do.
H. R. C.—I know you can help me on my problem. My husband had always promised me that he would live in the same town where my parents live after coming out of the service. He spent all of his money and now wants to live in the city. He can get work here. He had one job and quit it and left for the city. Now should I give up my home and my parents who have always given me everything I wanted and follow him? I want to stay near mother. I am twenty six years old.

Ans: A wife's duty is with her husband first and always. If he prefers to make his livelihood in the city, then it is surely your place to follow him. Marriage invariably separates a girl from her parents and you must not fret and worry if he wants to make a change. A couple never gets the joy and happiness from their marriage until they break all home ties and concentrate on making each other happy.

P. D.—I have been going with a man for 5 months. He asked me to marry him but he always makes dates and never shows up. What must I do?
Ans: Wash your hands of the whole affair. He's spending his time with another woman and regardless of what he says, his actions prove that he is not thinking of matrimony.

20 YEARS OF TALKING PICTURES

Bell System's Important Part in Developing the Equipment which Made Them Possible is Recalled by Celebration of the 20th Anniversary of Sound Motion Pictures to be Held August 6th.

Twenty years ago the movies added sound to sight. On August 6, 1926, "Don Juan"—first full length picture with a synchronized musical score—was successfully presented to a New York theatre audience.

A year later "The Jazz Singer"—first full length feature to use lip synchronization—was presented.

The sound equipment which made these and succeeding "talkies" possible was developed and made by Bell Telephone Laboratories and Western Electric Company. Thus began a new art, which now speaks throughout the world, direct outgrowth of the Bell System's continuous research to improve communications.

Sound motion pictures of a quality suitable for regular theatre presentation were not created in a day but grew out of many years of communications research. They were an important by-product of the work of many Bell scientists and engineers in their endeavor to improve telephones. Many others had tried to make the movies talk, but earlier efforts had been unsuccessful because the tools which telephone research was to create were not at hand.

Working toward the goal of a telephone service which would make possible the transmission of speech from anywhere to anywhere else on the face of the earth the Bell System scientists and engineers, by 1921, had developed all the essential elements for producing a sound motion picture, namely: (1) a high quality microphone capable of transmitting a wide range of sound frequencies without distortion, (2) the vacuum tube amplifier, (3) superior methods of recording sound on film and wax discs, and (4) a loud speaker of high quality capable of delivering undistorted and amplified sound in a wide range of frequencies.

An improved device for synchronizing motion pictures with electrically produced sound was constructed and the engineers believed it was time to see whether they could successfully make sound movies. Using the wax disc method, they produced the first electrically recorded talking picture, which was exhibited at Yale University, October 27, 1922. This picture was accompanied by a picture of a lecturer explaining the audio. The voice of the speaker came from the screen with so natural a quality and with such good timing that the assembled students and scientists at first suspected a hoax.

With this success, it was decided

SKY CRADLES FOR BABIES

NEW YORK—First passenger in this new, lightweight aluminum and plastic bassinet, was 13 month old Susan Negard, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Negard of Jackson Heights, N. Y. shown with Stewardess Gerry McGrail. The "Sky Cradle" was designed to provide comfortable trips for young passengers in four engine flagships of American Airlines. Lined with a waterproof, quilted type white plastic material, it is centered with a wide belt fastened by a zipper to hold the infant snugly. Hanging from the side and end are pockets for baby supplies. Two of the cradles are stowed in each plane, ready for use at the forward seats at either side of the aisle.
