The poles we need are coming along slowly Telephone poles are only one of the serious shortages handicapping our efforts to catch up with service demands. Lack of lead, copper and cotton insulation is likewise slowing the factories that build telephone switchboards, dial equipment, or furnish us with cable and wire. Every bit of equipment we can lay our hands on has been pressed into use in order to cope with the greatest demand for telephone service ever. But the need can only be really satisfied by more equipment—the first step in an expansion program calling for an outlay of well over 100 million dollars in the next five years. To attract the vast amount of money needed for the expansion and improvement of telephone service, our earnings must be comparable with the earnings of other businesses which are borrowing money from the investing public.
