NEGRO CHEMIST Had Part In USDA Penicillin Research

In the development of methods for mass production of penicillin—the miracle drug which is saving thousands of lives—Miss Sinah E. Kelley, a colored analytical chemist of the Northern Regional Research Laboratory of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, assisted with the project in the latter stages by performing important analyses of the Bureau of Agricultural and Industrial Chemistry.

Miss Kelley, who has done advanced work in chemistry at New York University, is a graduate of Radcliffe College. She transferred from the Peabody Normal School three years ago to the USDA Laboratory at Peoria, Ill., where she engaged in analytical chemical work in the Fermentation Division.

The major part of Miss Kelley's work consists of performing analyses for sugar and for the various fermentation products. During the war her work was connected with the mass production of penicillin. The production of penicillin is linked up with agriculture in that it is produced by a mold that lives on a diet composed almost completely of agricultural products—corn steep liquor and milk sugar.

Penicillin was discovered by a British scientist nearly 20 years ago. But up until a few months before our entrance into World War II, British scientists had not been able to produce the drug in significant quantities. During the summer of 1941 they brought their penicillin problem to the Northern Regional Research Laboratory where American scientists developed mass production techniques which made it possible to produce the remarkable drug in sufficient quantities to meet the critical need of Allied fighting men during the war.

By the end of 1944, some 21 chemical companies had taken the USDA laboratory's know-how and begun the production of penicillin in large quantities—about enough to treat serious infections of 250,000 persons per month. The miracle drug is effective against pneumonia, venereal diseases, and certain other types of infections.

With increased production of penicillin has come a corresponding decrease in price. Even two years ago the price had been reduced from $20 per 100,000 units to only $3.25. The amount required for a cure ranges from 100,000 to 150,000 units for gonorrhea to a million units or more for most other infections.

Having pioneered the research for the mass production of penicillin, the Northern Regional Research Laboratory is now turning its major interest to other research problems. This laboratory is one of four USDA research centers devoted to the important problem of finding new industrial uses for agricultural products.
