Story of Africa

By BLANCHE ALICE RICH

Africa 1947, is a different continent from the "dark" one so indelibly impressed upon the minds of the majority of the people in

"Brightest Africa." He is a sculptor and biographer of the vanishing greatness of the natural world of Africa. His life work will be assembled in the African and Roosevelt Halls of the American Museum, in bronzes in great groups of the elephant, and all of the animals, each group representing his unerring portrayal of the character of the animal and his sympathetic admiration of their finest qualities. He has come very close to death on three occasions in making close observations.

It think he seems to favor the elephant, more than any of the other animals. He spent many months studying all about the African elephant. He studied about them on the plains, in the forests, in the bamboo, and upon the mountains. He watched them in herds and singly, studied their paths, their feeding groups and everything about them. He says they are the most fascinating of all the animals on this earth.

One of the experiences I enjoyed reading was the way he described some of the characteristics of the elephants. A camp and there is no way to study them at night, so Mr. Ackley went to bed.

He got up early the next morning. The elephants had moved to the edge of the forest. There were at least seven hundred. He went upon a rock and watched them as they were drifting in. The sun was coming up. The monkeys greeted one another, everything was waking up. There was not a breath of air. All the forest was awake and moving about. There was a continuous roar of noise, but above it all was the crashing of trees as the elephants moved into the forest at least a mile wide. I think that must have been a wonderful sight to see.

Then an elephant detected his wind and wheeled about let out a scream. Instantly every sound ceased. Everything was quiet. The monkeys, the birds—all of the wild life stopped their racket. The elephants stood still and listened. Then soon he heard the rustling of the trees as though a great storm were coming. It gradually died away, and he realized the elephants had made it as they moved away. Ordinarily if there is any moisture elephants can travel without making any noise. In spite of their great bulk they are as silent and sometimes as hard to see as a jack rabbit. He said one thing he so liked to do. I think that must have been a wonderful sight to see.
