

Autumn and Winter Care of the Vineyard

At this season of the year we are receiving inquiries regarding proper method of trimming the vineyard, and what protection, if any, is needed over winter.

Commencing with the first year when planted, grape vines should be cut back to 3 or 4 buds and allow two or three canes to grow, also allow these two or three canes to branch at will. The object of the first season is to obtain such vigorous growth as will establish a good root system. The larger the amount of foliage, the stronger the root growth, each corresponding to the other.

Late in October or early in November, the first year's growth in the vineyard should again be cut back to about four of the most vigorous buds. Our habit is to throw the growth of the second year into three canes with such branches as these canes may develop. Our plan is to ultimately trim to two wires, the lower wire 24-30 inches from the ground, the upper 3 1/2 to 4 feet. On soil that has been heavily fertilized and is naturally very rich, it might be well to have a third wire 5-6 feet from the ground with the thought to give the foliage of the rampart growing vine, more sun and air.

At the end of the second season in the vineyard, if cultivation has been effective, canes from 4.8 feet in length or longer, have been produced. Those who give special care quite often get this growth the first season after planting.

Where the vine is allowed to grow at will, so many branches are thrown out that the shoots are weak and the bunches small. Weak shoots crowd each other and there is not room or sunlight for all. Pruning is a simple operation if the fundamental principle on which it rests is kept in mind. The fruit is borne near the base of the growing shoots of the season and the bearing shoots of next season are always from the growth of this. The intent in cutting away portions of the vine is to leave only a sufficient number of buds on canes of the current season's growth to give such an amount of fruit the coming season, as the age and strength of the vine can support.

Pruning should be varied somewhat to suit the habit of different varieties. The stronger growing varieties should have more wood allowed than the weaker. The vines should not be allowed to bear much fruit until strong enough to grow vigorous canes with strong laterals. Vigorous laterals develop near their base productive fruit buds. These laterals are cut back to from 4-6 buds depending on the age and strength of the vine. Allow as much fruit to set as the vine can support and grow to perfection in quality.

The third season it would not be well to allow the vine to bear more than 15-20 bunches. The fourth season a well handled vineyard is nearly full bearing. The fifth and sixth years probably near at its best.

In setting posts to support the wires, if they are placed 30 feet apart strong stays can be used for middle supports. The end posts should be strong, well braced, number 12 wire is heavy enough for use. After the vineyard is old enough to be supported by wires, we have found it profitable to still continue to trim the vines late in October or early November, cutting the canes loose from the wires, drop them on the ground with perhaps 2-3 forkfuls of straw to each vine, over this place sufficient soil to keep the wind from blowing through the straw and drying out the cane. This protection is not only beneficial to the canes but is of value in protecting the root system from our dry winters. We regard this protection useful any year, and absolutely essential, for our most trying winters. Early in April, uncover the vines rising the canes, tie to wires, using some soft string like wool twine soft enough and large enough not to chafe the cane. It will be found that the vine will remain dormant longer if taken up and tied to wire than if allowed to remain under cover of straw or soil.

We have found it profitable in Saline county to cover all varieties each and every winter. We cannot foretell when the trials of a severe winter may have to be endured.

Please read following article:

We notice a general feeling that seedling peach trees have greater hardihood than budded varieties and doubtless thousands of farmers will this fall plant peach pits with the idea of raising trees and planting them for a chance peach crop. Going through our nursery rows today, we notice that the budded varieties ripen their wood earlier and shed their foliage earlier than the seedling trees along the side or in the same rows. It not unfrequently happens that an occasional bud does not knit and grow. Thus an occasional seedling is growing to the row with the budded trees. This gives opportunity for comparison in regard to early ripening of wood and shedding of foliage. Another point of interest, nearly all of our hardier budded varieties have already set fruit buds on trees that have been growing six months only from the bud, that is, where budded in August and September 1900 and commenced growth in the spring of 1901. The seedling trees however, of the age of 2 years in the same row have not yet developed fruit buds. We notice that orchards of seedling peach trees do not as a rule fruit as early that is, at as young an age as orchards of budded varieties. During this year, 1901, in our orchards, yearling trees planted in the year 1901, in rare cases set and matured fruit the same summer. Not infrequently our hardiest budded varieties fruited the second summer and quite freely the third summer.

The Dutchess of Coldeburg apple is a standard as to hardihood because it invariably ripens its wood early in the fall long before the approach of winter. We find varieties of apples that those are the hardest which have the wood most completely ripened before the earliest late fall or winter periods of severe weather. An unripe tree may be damaged in October. Sometimes unripe trees are severely damaged by the first severe frost or rather freeze coming in September. It follows therefore that early ripening of wood is the treasure of hardihood. It is quite true that the average seedling may be harder than some budded varieties, notably those of the Crawford type or others of similar hardihood. Such varieties should be grown only in peach districts where the winter temperature never runs lower than 10 to 16 below zero.

By noticing the behavior of the budded peach in the nursery row we have some guides as to its hardihood. We have this day made careful examination of all the different varieties in nursery with a view of noting the condition of the tree as to maturity and as a basis of comparison on the above line of thought

Varieties noted for special hardihood ripen early, shed their foliage earlier than other varieties with less reputation for hardihood. It requires no more time nor space to grow peach trees of the hardiest known varieties than to grow seedlings of unknown and oftentimes of little value. The hardiest varieties of trees can now be purchased at such low prices that it seems much more profitable for the planter to fill his ground with varieties of the utmost hardihood and of known and positive good quality. Wide observations show that our hardiest varieties of grafted apple trees are far superior in hardihood to average seedling apple trees. Likewise the rare seedling peach of special hardihood and of sufficient quality to justify propagation is taken up, budded, named and set out with confidence knowing that it will be found much harder, much more valuable every way, than the average seedling.
