Kate Elmore, Leading Lady

not come. Then she was sure that he had not seen her leave the house, but was still watching it.

She was safe now. She went up the side street to the top and took a short and made her way into Holborn; there she took a cab and drove to the address given by Kate Elmore.

It was a poor, mean, little house, with dirty blinds and a general appearance of being left off in lodgings to people who were not too particular.

She knocked at the door and the landlady, an untidy person with an untidy baby in her arms and a small, untidy child clinging to her skirts, opened the door.

"I come from Mrs. Wilson, with a message for her husband. Is he at home?"

"No, he ain't, ma'am. He's gone away."

"Gone away!" exclaimed Rose, in astonishment.

"Yes, he paid me my rent and went away last night. He left a letter for Mrs. Wilson, which was to be given her when she came in."

"She is staying with me. I'll take the letter to her."

"Certainly, ma'am, and welcome."

The landlady went upstairs and fetched the letter and gave it to Rose. She looked at it, and a chill feeling crept over her heart.

The last doubt was removed. It was her husband's writing. She had always believed that Wilson was her husband, but the certainty was a shock to her, none the less.

She took the letter home. She was bound to give it to Kate. It might contain something that it was necessary she should know at once.

Kate opened it, read it, and then let it fall with a cry of anguish. The next moment she buried her face in her hands and burst into tears. "Read it," she sobbed.

Rose picked it up and read it.

It was a heartless letter. It told poor Kate, in a few words, that the man she had toiled and slaved for, the man for whom she had almost starved, had let his cowardice get the better of him. He said that the nervous dread was killing him, and he couldn't stop in London. He thought they would do better apart, as he was only a drag on her and he could keep out of the way better by himself. He was afraid that through her one day he would be run to earth. Then he would be taken from her, so perhaps it was just as well he should go now. Some day, if he had luck, he hoped to return and claim her, and she was to forget her unworthy husband and be happy.

The letter omitted to say that through a friend in the profession Jack had heard of a sudden vacancy in a company going to India, and that as it was only a vacancy for one he had thought it better to accept it and be off and leave his wife to shift for herself.

"He is a coward!" cried Rose; "a miserable, selfish coward. My dear, such a man isn't worth fretting for."

But Kate did fret. For a time she was almost heartbroken. She little knew what cause Rose Smedley had to view Mr. Wilson's conduct from the harshest possible standpoint. But she got over it in time and found a true and loyal friend in Rose. Today Kate Elmore is a favorite London actress, admired everywhere for her beauty, her grace, her cleverness, and her goodness.

She and Rose share a pretty little villa between them and they are as sisters. There is a common bond of sorrow between them, but only one of them knows it. They have both been deceived and deserted by the same man.

Rose has made up her mind that she will never let Kate know the truth, though now both of them are free to marry again.

The death of an English actor named Wilson was announced a short time since in the American papers.
