FAITHLESS 1890.

Said Father Time, "Oh, '90, you have proved yourself to be untrue! Oh, faithless year, you stand confest, You've gone back on me like the rest."

GOD SAVE THE KING.

NEW YEAR'S EVE—LONDON, 1763.
[Historical note—Theodore von Neuhoff, a German, was for a brief space king of Corsica. His subjects expelled him, and he died in London leaving his son Frederick claimant to the throne. Count Poniatowski became King of Poland in 1794. The tale printed below is founded on fact.]

Two men, groping through the fog, jostled each other at the door to Dolly's coffee house.

"Sir," exclaimed the elder, laying hand to his sword, "a man of honor!"

"Invariably allows precedence to his senior," interrupted the other, bowing gracefully and stepping aside.

"And," continued the first speaker, the frown vanishing from his brow, "he grants so much consideration for that senior's testiness that he excuses him and becomes his guest at dinner."

"Pardon, monsieur," responded the younger man, "but I am the Count Poniatowski."

"Then rank shall not hedge your refusal, for I am Frederick, King of Corsica. So, now, to table, and waiter, bring us of your best."

Seated in the room to which the attendant conducted them he of middle age and he of primal vigor gazed at each other questioningly.

"Count," began the former, "have you hopes in Poland?"

"I scarce can tell. I wait the will and favor of Catherine of Russia."

"Dream not too fairly of the future. I, too, wait and plan and hope—but pshaw! here comes the wine. Now a toast. Fill high and drink deep, for 'tis yourself. To the successor of Sobieski; may he soon reign at Warsaw."

"I send it back, your majesty. To the son of Theodore; may he yet rule the realm his father won."

"Dinner is served," interposed the waiter.

It was a meal of the sort for which Dolly's coffee house had fame, and the new friends failed not in devotion to the smoking dishes. The plates removed they ordered pipes and port. His majesty, flushed with generous drinking, felt in his waistcoat pocket and withdrew an empty hand. He turned to the attendant.

"You have served a king right royally, and shall have a royal fee. Your name?"

"Wilkins, sire."

"Twill remain in memory. To-morrow expect a parchment creating you knight of Ajaccio."

"While, in present payment," laughed the count, "take this bright English crown of silver. 'Tis the last of many."

"My humble thanks to both. And here's your bill."

"I have a score," replied Frederick, "to which direct the manager to add this item. So, Wilkins, adieu until the morn."

The three entered the public room, the waiter hastening ahead to confer with a burly man behind the bar. The latter exclaimed:

"Look ye, Mister King, or whatever you call yourself! I claim good coin for good fare. Too much you are my debtor now."

"My purse is empty, but we will not parley," answered Frederick, drawing a massive ring from his finger. "Here is the signet of my dominion of Corsica. I leave it in pawn till I come again. Does it satisfy your clamor?"

"Twill do," growled the manager, weighing the jewel in his hand.

At the door Poniatowski and the pretender halted. The fog had risen. Frost filled the air. The stars shone undimmed. It was a glorious English winter's night.

TWO NEW YEAR'S CALLS.

On New Year's day he made a call; He called alone, in proper style. He called upon a maiden fair— His friend received him with a smile.

That night he made another call. He called with three or four—pretty things. He called upon a friend of his— His friend received him with three kings.

A True Friend.

He—Mabel, last February you promised to give me your answer on New Year's day. Since then I have generously refrained from seeking your company and now, my darling, I have come to claim you.

She—Alas! I fear it is too late. You know I've been engaged to Charlie Smith since March.

He—Oh, that's all right. He's a friend of mine, and I asked him to become engaged to you as a favor to keep the other fellows off.

She—Yes, but we were married last week.

Employee—Now that it's the first of the year I thought I should like to talk with you about an increase of my salary.

Head of Firm—Tut, tut! Can't possibly do it. You're getting a good salary, are not married, and have no incumbencies.

Employee (haughtily)—Sir, you have evidently been misinformed about my affairs. I belong to a building and loan association.

Head of Firm—Heavens! Sign these partnership papers.

Forced to It.

Travers—This is the first New Year's I remember where I can look back and say that I haven't bought a thing that I haven't paid for.

Dashaway—Has it been so bad as that?

Travers—What do you mean?

Dashaway—Couldn't you get any one to trust you?
