"Nebraska," says an exchange, "as compared with her sister states, will fly with the geese, this fall, with her splendid crop of corn. An agricultural state in time of panic is the place to abide in. It is headquarters for provisions and in times when men get hungry it is a good idea to keep close to the provender."

How a Bold Lover Won the Day and Also Won His Girl From Her Father.

He was a mild young fellow, and, as his sweetheart imagined, without much force of character, as he kept putting the "ask papa" day off indefinitely. So the young woman prompted him to be sure he was right and go ahead.

"You see, papa has a great deal of bluff and bluster, but when you come right down to it he is perfectly safe. Only you must show him that you have plenty of courage—real grit. That's what he likes."

"All right. Suppose you ask him to step in now. I may as well get my hand in if that is the way it works."

"But, dearest, he is awful big and strong, you know."

"Oh, if it comes to personal violence I will defend myself with the furniture. Trot him in."

"And you won't let him put you out?"

"Not a bit."

"Then I'll tell him you want to see him."

There were two chances of escape for the young man—one by way of the door, the other by the window—but he did not avail himself of either.

When the father strode into the room with his best knock-down-and-drag-out air, the youth rose indifferently to meet him.

"Well, well, what's all this about? I understand you want to see me. Well, look at me now and be quick about it," growled the pater.

"I'm. Can't say as you're much to look at, Mr. —. I merely wished to mention to you that Miss Clara has engaged herself to me with my consent, and I propose to fill my part of the contract to the letter."

"Trot! Trot! My daughter!"

"Take care, old man. Call me as many names as you please, but refer to my future wife with proper respect."

"Get out of this house, you!"

"Certainly. As soon as my wife that is to be can conveniently pack up her belongings we will go."

"Why, you impudent!"

"Oh, keep cool; keep cool. I could hold you out of the window with one hand and call for the police with the other. I was champion hitter and slugger at college. Look at that muscle," and he clinched a No. 7 hand into a formidable fist.

"I never was so!"

"Nor I. Call it quits. I want your daughter, and I don't care a continental for your money or your blessing. We can begin the world without either, just as other young fools have done. This is business, sir, business."

The father felt his own head to see if he was going to have an apoplectic fit, then answered grimly:

"All right; I like your style. I should have said 'yes' anyway if you had given me time, but you took me by surprise. I may say I was never so surprised in my life."

"Nor I," assented the lover as he sunk almost fainting into a chair, "but I'm a business man, and don't you forget it. I don't stand any foolishness either in love or war," and he wiped the cold perspiration off his forehead with a nervous hand.

He had won the day and the girl too.—Million.

Practical Philanthropy.

An excellent steward of this world's goods is Augustus Hemenway, a retired farmer of Canton, Mass. He invited all the public school teachers of that town, 26 in number, to take a 10 days' trip to the World's fair at his expense.

This is practical philanthropy of a kind that warms the heart and increases confidence in the goodness of human nature. It is an easy matter to advise every one to visit the exposition, but there are thousands of people anxious to follow the advice who are confronted with the perplexing and discouraging problem of ways and means. Underpaid schoolteachers, struggling clergymen, men and women to whom the expenditure of $100 for an outing means serious sacrifices for the remainder of the year, may be found in all parts of the country, longing to go to Chicago, but restrained by financial considerations. They are not suffering or destitute; they simply can not afford to indulge in the luxury of a trip to the fair. To this class, intelligent and appreciative, a friend like Mr. Hemenway is a friend indeed.—Rochester Democrat.

Looking at Things.

When Mr. Hudson was in Patagonia, he fell in with a gambler, who told him that always after the first few rounds of the game he knew some of the cards as they were dealt. He recognized them by a difference so slight that another man could not detect it even when it was pointed out to him.

Mr. Hudson is an ornithologist, and he says that this same preternaturally sharp eyed man was greatly surprised when he was told that half a dozen kinds of sparrows were feeding and singing about the house. He had never seen any difference in them, he said. In size, color, shape and actions they were all alike, and they all sang and twittered alike, so far as he had ever noticed.—Youth's Companion.

Russian Oil Kings.

The wealthy Russian oil kings, the Nobel brothers, who have driven American oil out of eastern Europe, have no lack of crude petroleum, for the firm itself is said to own 50 oil wells near Baku, and several are plugged down, not being wanted at present. One of these monster wells has suddenly spouted 80,000,000 gallons to the surface, and not long ago the great Drogjba fountain rose to the height of 800 feet and ejected the oil at the rate of 8,000 tons a day.—London Tit-Bits.

Can't Faze an English Sparrow.

A sparrow has built its nest and laid four eggs inside a gong at Isleworth railway station. The gong has a circumference of 81 inches, is sounded upward of 180 times every day, and when it is rung the alarm can be heard 600 yards away.—St. James Gazette.
