The United States Investor has this suggestion on the subject that is now uppermost in the public mind: "One fact is of special interest in connection with the recent crop news; in certain sections where artificial irrigation has been adopted the damage to the crop has been comparatively slight. This season, in fact, has probably been the best test of artificial irrigation on record. The lesson is one which must enforce itself on every intelligent mind. As the west becomes richer and the farmers more forehanded, the development of irrigation schemes will undoubtedly be greatly accelerated. This is an end to be desired, not only because the farmer will be thereby guaranteed more uniform crops, but because, also, gambling in cereals will be divested of a large part of its attractiveness by reason of the greater certainty regarding the outcome of each year's harvest."
