

RUTHERFORD BIRCHARD HAYES.

The nineteenth president of the United States was born in Delaware, O., In 1822 and died in Fremont, O., in 1893. He served through the civil war with conspicuous ability, being brevetted major general for gallant achievements. He was serving his third term as governor of Ohio when he received the Republican nomination for president in 1876. The contest with Samuel J. Tilden, the Democratic candidate, was so close that a special electoral commission was created to determine the issue. This commission decided that Hayes had received a majority of one electoral vote. After his retirement Hayes became president of the National Prison association and was also the first president of the states board for the instruction of freedmen and an active promoter of education in the south.
