A Card.
 McCook, Neb., March 29, 1908.
 To the Citizens of McCook:
 There is a moral issue of vast importance in its meaning to the homes of our city, which issue will be settled for a year at least in the selection of a mayor. The enforcement of all laws and ordinances is with the mayor, and not the council. The present mayor ordered houses of infamy closed. A bribe of $300 was offered if these houses would be allowed to run. The bribe was emphatically rejected; Fahnestock couldn't be bought. Some of these women are still here, and they are here because they have been promised their hellish liberty if the Citizens' candidate for mayor is defeated.

The national laws are against these houses, the state laws are against these houses, the city ordinances are against these houses, and certain persons propose to defy all these laws and permit prostitution to be permitted to prevail, for the sake of satisfying lust and adding a few dollars per month to the city treasury—the price of virtue. The Citizens platform in part says:
 "We declare most emphatically against the least toleration whatever of houses of infamy and denounce as a menace to our homes, a disgrace to our morals, and bribery on the part of officials, to permit them to run for a money consideration as a means of city revenue, it being worse than blood money—the price of virtue. The other party platform favors revenue from this source. If these houses run, it takes boys and girls to run them. What father and mother will furnish their inmates? Do you want to lend your children for such traffic? Think on these things."
