"Senator Burkett was one of the men on whom I especially relied while I was President, both while he was in the House and in the Senate. I was able to accomplish what I did accomplish in Washington, only because of the way I was backed by men like Senator Burkett, and as we have a guest from Iowa present, let me say, like Senator Dolliver."

THE PATRIOTISM OF NORRIS.

About the only thing which the enemies of Congressman George W. Norris have been able to scrape up in an effort to defeat his re-election, is his refusal to vote for the Burleson resolution to depose Speaker Cannon.

Yet no act in their careers so emphasizes the courage, foresight and sincerity of Congressman Norris and his fellow insurgents as their refusal to vote for this resolution.

The republican congress had been elected in 1908 on pledges that its candidates would adopt a number of progressive acts.

When the Burleson resolution was introduced, although several months of the session had passed, nothing had been done by congress to redeem the pre-election pledges. Furthermore, it was plain that it was the intention of the leaders of both parties to do nothing.

Had Cannon been deposed the republicans could not have agreed upon any man of their own party to fill the speaker's chair. The democrats being in the minority would have been unable to name the speaker.

Consequently, the house would have been in a deadlock and none of the things for which the insurgents were fighting could have been accomplished.

This was exactly what both democratic and republican standpatters wanted to happen. Following events thoroughly established the fact.

Had Cannon not known the nature of the resolution that was about to be presented, he would not have recognized Burleson. It was only because Cannon and the standpat leaders wanted to bring about a condition that would absolve them from their obligation to redeem their pre-election pledges that Burleson was recognized, that his resolution was introduced and read, and that it was brought to a vote.

During the progress of the ballot, standpat republicans did their best to anger the insurgents in order to make them lose their heads—shook their fists in the faces of the insurgents, called them cowards and dared them to vote for the removal of the speaker.

In spite of all this and with the knowledge that their actions would be misconstrued at home, the insurgents stifled their inclinations to wreak personal vengeance upon the one who had been their tormentor; and, like cool-headed, patriotic representatives, they opposed the passage of the resolution and rendered possible the accomplishments of the latter part of the session—the enactment of the railroad regulation bill, the postal savings bank bill, the bill providing for the publicity of campaign contributions—in short, all the progressive legislation that was enacted.

The insurgents should be praised, not blamed, for their self-control in such a trying situation.

The country reaped great benefit, not only in the progressive measures that were passed, but in the fact that when the time was ripe Norris was able to pass his resolution which deprived the speaker of the czar-like power which he had before.

Cannon's removal would have been the gratification of a whim only and would have been most unpopular.

But Norris and the insurgents were not making their fight to acquire popularity.

They were fighting for the right, and the country owes them much for doing what they believed was for the best interests of their constituents when they knew that their actions would be subjected to the closest scrutiny and would undoubtedly be understood.
