UNBENDING OF A STATUE.

Being a Brief Account of a Meeting Between a Coachman and a Dog.

Here was a coachman sitting on his box in an attitude of immovable rigidity and holding his whip at an angle equally unchangeable apparently, says the New York Sun.

He was driving up Fifth avenue. And to see him as he was then you would have thought that had an earthquake occurred under the rear wheels of his brougham and slewed the body of it around at right angles with the team he would have driven on, just the same. But:

When a big, rough coated, black dog came bounding along in the street at his off horse's side and began barking at the horses, the coachman who had seemed so immovable changed his attitude slightly, and, with lightning-like swiftness, threw his whip over and down, making the long lash of it curl neatly and snugly around the big black dog's body. And then he and his whip came back, as on stiff springs, to just the same positions as before.

It was not a cruel blow, but it was sharp enough to make the dog think. But it might have been a chance hit. Drivers often lash at dogs, and almost as often miss them; and the dog kept on bounding at the horse's side, and kept on barking; and then:

Once more the coachman shifted his attitude slightly, and over came that whip again, and down, with an absolutely unerring accuracy; its long lash curling around the black dog's body again, and this time stinging right smartly. And then again did coachman and whip spring back, as at first.

And this time the dog understood fully, and drew off, with tail wagging, but rather feebly; while the passers-by on the sidewalk who had seen the incident smiled rather more heartily.

And the coachman? He drove on up Fifth avenue in an attitude of immovable rigidity, holding his whip at an angle equally unchangeable apparently. If you had seen him then you would surely have thought that, even if an earthquake occurred under the rear wheels of his brougham and slewed the body of it around at right angles with the team, he would have driven right on, just the same.
