The defeat of the bonds was expected by those who knew the situation best. It would serve no good purpose to exploit the reason for the defeat as it is generally understood. The business element was practically united in its opposition. Judge John L. Cleaver led the opposition and the organization perfected by him had a great deal to do with the result. The mayor took occasion to insult Mr. Cleaver on the evening of election day, but we presume the satisfaction the judge must feel at his success will compensate him for the choice names his honor saw fit to call him. It would seem to us that a bond issue is something about which citizens and taxpayers could differ without subjecting anyone to cat calls and opprobrious epithets. However, it is a matter of temperament and character. So what's the use, the bonds were beaten.

Both Will Hutchings and John Nulk are doing well in their respective locations and their friends here will be glad to know that such is the case.

It looks natural to see Charley Rickards once more presiding over a lumber office and all his old time friends dropping in to chat with him, and to secure his assistance in filling their lumber wants. The scene is familiar to all those who have known Mr. Rickards for so many years and who never think of him without thinking also of piles of lumber and the odor of pine that characterizes the general atmosphere of the lumber yard. Mr. Rickards told a Tribune reporter this week that he feels pretty much at home in the office of the Chicago Lumber & Coal Co., and as the local manager, is accomplishing much in the way of increasing the volume of trade and adding new names to his list of satisfied customers. No man enjoys a wider personal acquaintance in this section and he is thoroughly familiar with all the details of the lumber business.
