

Something Good Out of Nazareth.

It is not often in this life that corruption puts on incorruption.

It is even more infrequent that the penitentiary serves to reform a man.

The stripes of a convict seem to burn into the self esteem of the wearer leaving a scar that to him seems observed of all men.

"The exception proves the rule" is a trite apothegm, and in the case of Charles Broaden formerly of Rulo, until last week an inmate of the penitentiary at Lincoln, it is a truism.

Broaden was one of those humans who seemed alien to his kind. In the economy of the universe he seemed placeless and one wondered at his existence.

One night some ten years past, on a lonely desolate island in the Missouri river south of Rulo, he killed a man. He was prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to 23 years in the penitentiary.

If the words of the judge condemning him to nearly a quarter of a century of being buried alive affected him in any way, his face did not disclose it.

As he sat there nervously looking about him as though striving to understand, some one asked him why he had committed murder and he replied, "I never had no chance like others."

I thought it the weak excuse of a weak man. I was wrong.

Broaden had a nature that did not develop in liberty, it was free only in confinement.

His home was among those whom Ingalls called "the cat-fish aristocracy."

He lived on an island that was born of a snag and high water. When the "rise" went down it left the sand bar that gathered silt and sand until large enough to provide habitations for human drift wood that seems never to fit any other locality.

On this island when the willow, the cotton wood and the sycamore spring from the seeds borne by the winds to its dreary waste, where poisonous vapors bubbled from the green ooze of its marshes, where squalor, filth and illiteracy held their undisputed kingdoms, were men drank raw liquor and alcohol to stupefaction and slatterly females heard tales of purity and virtue as children listen to the fables of princes and princesses who walked this gray old earth once upon a time, he spent his boyhood.

Parasites embraced huge trees in poisonous profusion and wild grape vines swayed creaking in the night winds like a "gallows without its tenant."

Amid such scenes, enveloped by such environment, associated with such companions, Charles Broaden became a man.

One night on the island he shot one of his kind, a man named Powell. The two were down by the ferry landing; a shot was heard in the darkness—then silence.

The work was not completed for a pleading fearful cry of don't, oh don't, was immediately followed by another shot.

They brought Powell to Falls City where I saw him die three days later. He went to meet his God with eyes wide staring. His last breath was a shriek of fear as there entered the "pale messenger with inverted torch."

Such a man was Charles Broaden when ten years ago he was taken to Lincoln.

The Governor pardoned him last week. He left his prison home the equal in refinement, in culture, in education, of any man in the state. At his request he was employed in the prison library. From early morning until the lights went out in his cell at 9 o'clock he was busy with his books. In science in literature his education is remarkable. For the past five years he alone has suggested to the board the proper and necessary books to purchase. The Warden and Chaplain of the penitentiary represented to the Governor that they had never met a young man who was his equal. His case was brought to the attention of the Methodist clergy in the state and at their request the Governor made investigation. The result is his pardon. The state needs his liberty, and his services. He is far too useful a citizen to be confined. His nature has developed into a sensitive refinement. He knows his old ways no more. The penitentiary has at last reformed a man and again something good has come out of Nazareth.
