A Revery.

Do you really enjoy hearing grand opera? This is a question often asked of the amateurs or those who do not pretend to be musicians. Most people can truthfully contend that they do. Of course, there may be many who attend because it is the popular thing, but a majority actually go to hear and revel in the magnificent voices and the great orchestras.

The writer heard "Martha," in Kansas City last week. Afterwards we learned that a great mistake was made in missing "Lohengrin," the other opera on the Kansas City bill. "Martha" is hardly grand opera, but when Sembrich, Caruso, Plancon and Louise Homer carry the principal roles, they make it more than interesting. I shall never hear the "The Last Rose of Summer" sung again without the memory of Sembrich's and Caruso's voices echoing each strain.

Caruso is considered the greatest living tenor by educated musicians. He appeals to the commonality just as much. For he is entirely unaffected in his singing, he does not vibrate and quiver on convenient high notes, and the volume, sweetness and purity of his tones can be recognized by everybody. An old German sitting next me in convention hall exclaimed after Caruso had finished a remarkable performance, "To think a dago can do that." Then a gay, old lady, who was wearing short sleeves and seemed otherwise pretty well dressed up, began to analyze his voice. I didn't want to hear it. It was like dissecting a song bird's throat to discover its mechanism.

When Sembrich strikes a high note and then displays the gymnastic quality of her voice by running impossible scales with perfect ease, you sit up, and take notice, always. Critics say her voice is becoming uneven and worn. I shouldn't have known it. I'm glad I wasn't able to detect it. One thing I observed. She rather likes to have all the interest and enthusiasm centered in herself.

The next time grand opera is given in Omaha or Kansas City there ought to be a large delegation from Falls City to hear it. Trains run conveniently, the expense is moderate.

The nearest a destructive earthquake has ever come to Nebraska in historic time is New Madrid, Missouri—about five hundred miles in an air line. The event began December 16, 1811, and continued for several weeks. The accounts of early settlers, flatboatmen and explorers are filled with the vivid story of this "great shake," as it was called. Tracts of land as large as an average Nebraska county were sunk to such great depth that tall trees disappeared in the waters which rushed in and formed lakes still existing today. Cracks in the earth five miles long, ten feet wide and several feet deep appeared. Chickens were shaken out of trees where they roosted, flat boats were sunk and houses shaken down. The small population in the region prevented great loss of life, two women only being killed among the settlers. Congress passed an act for relief, permitting those who had lost their land to select new claims elsewhere, on public lands in Missouri. These lands were called "New Madrid claims," and became the source of litigation later.—State Journal.
