A Homily to the Hen

Let poets sing praises of wild geese flying high

This bard will take a fat hen for a pot-pie,

Let scribes write praises of swans flying and dead

But it takes hens's eggs to buy butter and bread.

While the pea fowls strut and say, here big I, goes.

The hens are laying eggs to buy the children clothes;

In showing pretty feathers there is no harm

But the hens help lift the mortgage off the farm.

The hen raises chickens to sell and fry

Then lays eggs to made custard and pumpkin pie.

Of all birds the quail can fly swifter than any other,

But of all fowls the hen is the kindest stepmother.

While the night bird is saying to man with bad wife whip-her-Will The hen is hovering her step-children and saying, hush be still:

While the dear people are eating their boiled owls We will crown the hen queen of all the fowls. — T. M. AIKMAN.
