Conquer Your Temper.

Conquer your temper, darling. In a dungeon bid it stay And never let it see daylight And 'twill wither and die. But let it become your master, 'Twill make you forever a slave And keep you in constant trouble 'Till you fill an early grave. Your life will be a burden To yourself and others too, For the temper is sure to spoil things Whatever you try to do. You're sure to meet disappointments For they come to everyone And if your temper is master, Rash things are apt to be done. For some one is sure to offend you If your temper is master at all And hot words are sure to be spoken, You would later give worlds to recall But some one has suffered your anger, Your harsh words have wounded a friend Who considers you now but a stranger For the wound you have made will not mend. Thus you lose first one then another And colder and stranger they've grown, 'Till at last, just because of your temper You are friendless, forlorn and alone. But still you cling to your temper And cherish it year after year, 'Till at last when you lie in your coffin There's none to shed even a tear. But if you can conquer and kill it And bring loving thoughts in its place You'll be so much happier, darling, And your kindness will show in your face. Your friends will be many and faithful Their love and devotion will show And when you are old and feeble With hair as white as the snow You will reap the fruits of your kindness In the light of their loving care; Those friends you never have wounded Whose burdens you helped to bear. Then conquer your temper, darling, In a dungeon bid it stay And bring out your smiles to make sun shine And be happy forever and aye. Florence, Nebraska.—May H. Oakes.

His Best Trade.

To spectators, the rooms of the stock, the grain and the cotton exchanges in trading hours look like madhouses. So different is the procedure there from what it is where business involving great interests is usually transacted that a symbolism has come into common use removing the buyers and the sellers from the human category, and they are called bulls and bears.

Of course everyone who employs these terms is always conscious of the exaggeration they imply as metaphors, and yet, while very little reflection suffices to make it plain that the shrewdest intelligence, the coolest temper and the utmost degree of self-command must be behind most of the operations, it is considered that the very nature of their occupation must to a certain extent de-humanize those engaged in this kind of commerce. If not bulls and bears, they are at best rated as gamblers playing for the largest stakes, unscrupulous, merciless, in whom the common human qualities that make up worthy character are stunted or crushed out by the over-mastering passion for gain. Noble ideals are abandoned, friends are cast away or betrayed, homes sacrificed—everything that ought to be precious in life put in pawn in a desperate game of irresistible fascination.

But occasionally a most pleasantly familiar and distinctly human note comes from this bedlam of mercenary strife. The dispatches a few days ago announced that the "veteran of a score of campaigns in the cotton market" had decided to drop out of the game to devote his entire time to his sick boy. He has closed out all his commitments, amounting to thousands of bales of the May option, selling his carriages and horses at public auction, and will go off to the seashore with his invalid son. Said he:

I consider my son's health of more importance than money, and when the physicians told me it was necessary to take him to the seashore for the next two or three years I decided to close out all my

Is Opportunity Wanting?

One of the stock arguments which Mr. Bryan includes in almost every speech he makes is that young men no longer have any opportunity to succeed in life because the present condition of our industrial and social system prohibit it. To use a phrase of his, "monopoly is closing the door of opportunity to your boy and my boy."

Plausible as this may seem, the facts do not sustain Mr. Bryan's condition. In this matter, as in many others, Mr. Bryan has a wonderful capacity for making assertions. He is as long on theories and fancies as he is short on facts. Notwithstanding the changed conditions which every one must recognize do prevail today in the business world, there never was a time in the history of the nation with such great opportunities for men with brains to succeed as there is at the present. It is true that the opportunity which existed a generation ago for every man to go into business for himself on a small capital and to plod in a small way, has passed. But strongly as those days appeal to our imagination, in reality did the great majority of men make any large success under that system of doing business? The capital of the country has admittedly found its way into great channels of industry and everything is now done, if it is to be made a success, in a great way. But while it is easy to rail at corporations and combinations they offer to hundreds of men most magnificent opportunities in business directions which the world affords.

It is true that there are thousands of unemployed men, but it is because they are either unskilled or shiftless. It is true that the high places are not to be permanently filled by men of ordinary attainments. This the young man should understand, but he should also understand that the world is waiting as never before for men of great ability to do things in a thousand different lines and along many avenues of life there is an increasing demand for men of capacity. Moreover, this is the era of young men. Never before was the young man so eagerly sought and was such a premium put upon his services. Neither is he sought because of his wealth or social position. This cuts no ice whatever. What the great business interests of the country want are results and the one question they ask of any man who offers his services is, "Can he deliver the goods?" The great positions are open to the poor boys of the country and they are by the thousands making good, but the supply is no where near equal to the demand. The great agencies, like Hapgood's, which make a business of employing men for others, will tell you that they have numerous $5,000 jobs. The great problem is to get $5,000 men to fill them.

Much as we may deplore corporation in some aspects, it must be admitted by every candid observer that they have given as a result of their gigantic and tremendous output of business employment to hundreds of skilled laborers at salaries that would not investigate the problem more definitely. Take the United States Steel Corporation for example. It is a well known fact that its executive force is almost exclusively made up of poor boys. Almost without exception, the men who are at the head of these great departments commanding princely salaries have known what it is to be poor in the genuine experience of the boy who struggles without pull and without any special favor. They enter the departments with an eye to business, with a willingness to work, with a patient persistence, and under the direction of able, alert, trained men they themselves have become the masters of the situation. And yet these men are so few in numbers compared to the real needs for the carrying on of this business and others similar to it, that Andrew Carnegie has established in Pittsburg the largest technical institute in the world with the sole aim of supplying trained men for these different positions. In this institute the poor boy has all the chances of the son of the wealthiest man in the country. Similar institutions are springing up all over the land and there is going out an urgent demand that young men train their hands, their eyes and their brains in such a manner as to deal with the practical affairs of commercial and industrial life. The Steel company is not alone. Regardless of the fact that public criticism has exhausted itself on much that the Standard Oil company has done, here is another great corporation, whatever its other sins may be, that has been conspicuous in giving splendid rewards to the young men who have done their work well. Perhaps no other corporation in the country values its salaried men more highly and gives them more substantial recognition than Mr. Rockefeller's company.

It is in the larger corporations where favoritism counts for less than it does anywhere else. It is here that the strictest business principles prevail. Men are not hired by these great business
