Should Be a Change

The service on the stub trains is not only poor but the company is working its men to death as well. The train crews are up at five in the morning and get in at ten at night. Seventeen hours is too long for any man to work. The time could be shortened materially if the company would put decent engines on the line. One of the engines now handling the stubs has been in service since 1879. Its boilers are so old and its valves so leaky that it burned twenty-three tons of coal on the round trip last Friday. How would you like to be the fireman for whom a day's work is seventeen hours, in which he shoveled twenty-three tons of coal?
