This was successfully done and he is now back home and considers himself out of danger.
One of the more interesting incidents we have noticed lately, which illustrates the change of our neighborhood from the wild prairie of early days to the thickly settled country of today is the fact of R. R. Draper felling a pine tree grown on his farm north of town, from which a saw log was taken to the Siltes saw mill and cut into lumber.

While we write these items the wind is blowing apparently at the rate of 'steven miles a minute and it is so cold that people have to have clothes about the stove to keep warm and the school authorities are talking of dismissing school. As the living rooms of the writer's house are on the south and east of the building, we are not suffering with cold so much as though with these rooms on the north. Another consolation we have is that there is no immediate danger of a southwind, because at the rate it is going to the south-east it would not seem possible for it to stop this side of Kansas City and could not possibly regain consciousness and get back here in less than three days.
