MAKING EARLY HOG PASTURE

Question is Attracting More Attention Than in Former Years and is of Much Importance.

(By R. B. RUSHING.)

The question of growing early pastures for hogs is attracting more attention of late years than it did a few years ago, and it is well that farmers wake up and avail themselves of the value of growing such crops.

This matter of growing something for early spring pastures for hogs, is something that the farmer of limited means can do.

The profit derived from the growing of crops for hog pasture is, I find, greater than that derived from growing crops that have to be harvested.

Hogs can be turned into the pasture and they will do a good job harvesting, saving every little bit of the crop, much more than could be saved if harvested, as they clean up many things that man or machinery cannot get.

If we have been negligent in sowing something in the way of clover or rye, for early hog pasture, then it behooves us to plant some other forage crop for them and also one that will make grazing as early in the spring as possible.

For the very earliest purpose I usually sow a patch of oats, at the rate of two bushels to the acre. I prefer drilling them for a forage crop, as they will then withstand the drought and tramping over them and also will not lift out of the soil as easily.

I find it better to have a lot divided so as to pasture a part of it at a time, while the other will be growing. This plan has given me the best satisfaction.

The regular hog fence is not expensive and is easily moved if desired. I am able to sow oats very early in the spring and they make a very rapid, vigorous growth and give me a good pasture quicker than anything else that I can sow.

When the oats are from five to seven inches high it is time to turn hogs in. It usually requires about five or six weeks to have them this high.

My next crop for pasture a little later is peas, and I prefer drilling them for several reasons. When drilled they are all planted at a uniform depth and will come up more evenly, and they can be cultivated once or twice and will stand dry weather better, and stock will follow the rows better, and there will not be so much waste.

A common wheat drill is the most convenient and satisfactory for drilling the peas, using the first, fourth, seventh and tenth holes. This will make the drills 24 inches apart.

Peas are ready to turn into when they are coming into stiff dough. If you have never grown any it will be wonderfully surprising how hogs will take on fat and grow while feeding on peas.

Soy beans also make good pasture, but these are usually sown later and hardly come under the head of early pasture. But for forage after the peas are exhausted they are invaluable. Sorghum cane also makes excellent forage, and where the earliest varieties are selected it will be sufficiently matured by the last of June or the first of July for pasturing.

In fact I have pastured sorghum cane when quite young and find it a good fattening food.

BISHOP BURGESS ON LIQUOR

Saloon is Greatest Enemy of Home and Cause of Much of Our Domestic Infelicity.

In a recent address before the annual Episcopal convention of the diocese of Long Island, held at Garden City, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Frederick Burgess said:

"If the church condemns the saloon it is not because the church hates the workingman, or his wife, or his family, but because the saloon is the greatest enemy of the home, because it more than anything else, accounts for the fearful congestion of our cities, where human beings have to herd at night like beasts; because it sends the man home at night with no money in his pockets and with no sense of shame, with curses in his mouth and murder even in his heart. Make the blessing from the saloon as great as you can and it will still remain that it is more responsible than anything else for domestic infelicity and that its influence is against that loveliest of human traits which Saint Paul taught and which the King James translators, consciously or unconsciously, rendered into the noble rhythm: 'Husbands, love your wives and be not bitter against them.'

"I believe that Christian people stand reasonably on the law. A prominent judge on the Supreme court bench of New York said to me not long ago: 'You cannot galvanize these old Sunday laws and put life into them.' That is true if they are really dead. A law dies the moment it ceases to accord with a strong minority of the people. It is of no use inopert on the statute books, for all it does is to become one of the richest sources of unholy revenue to unscrupulous police and officials. If the popular sentiment favors the open Sunday, then by all means let us wipe out the law against it so that it may no longer confuse the mind of the public.

"I think the attitude of Christian people in New York has greatly changed toward the Sunday, and that our Sunday laws need restatement. We no longer look at exercise or recreation as wrong upon Sunday, nor do we constantly talk about the Sabbath, we realize it is not an unholy sight to see a lot of young men playing ball on Sunday afternoon or riding or strolling in the parks. The day Christ rose from the dead is the happiest day in the week, and we clergy must know that we shall not secure a larger attendance at church because we try to take from the day all its joys and brightness. But none the less I believe that while the church may well approve of the opening of museums, libraries and the increased facilities for travel on the Lord's day, yet it will not approve of the opening of theaters or the exhibition ball games or the saloons.

"The local option question, on the other hand, is in my opinion a mistake. There should be one temperance law for the whole state, with perhaps exceptions made for the great cities. The introduction of one of the most contentious subjects into local politics is mischievous in the extreme. It arouses wrangling and leads oftentimes to hard feelings which would have been avoided had the outlook been wider. It brings each village clergyman into undue prominence, and men find themselves forced to explain to the public their own private views of habits; or else be stamped in an unfavorable way by their fellow citizens."

EMPLOYERS' RULE ON DRINK

British Corporation Issues Restriction to Employees During Spare Time and at Lunch.

It is becoming more and more evident that employers of labor are everywhere coming into line in the matter of demanding sobriety among their workmen and prohibiting their drinking while engaged in the company's business. Reports state that instructions have recently been issued to the employees of a great Gas, Light and Coke company operating in the Metropolis of Great Britain that they must not, except on the company's business, enter any public house. About 800 men are affected. The heads of the departments are called upon to see that the injunction is scrupulously observed. It is pointed out that it was issued in the best interests of the men as well as with a view to maintaining the company's credit. The order applies to the spare time and the dinner hour of the men many of whom were accustomed to resort to the public houses in the vicinity during such time.

Russians Banish Vodka.

The rations of the Russian soldier have hitherto included a certain quantity of vodka distributed after maneuvers, parades, regimental celebrations, and other special occasions. Dispatches state that the Military Council has now decided to replace the vodka allowance by light wine, beer or an improved quality of food, according to climatic and other conditions. The sale of vodka and other spirituous liquors will be prohibited at the canteens; and in general, whether in time of peace or war, the soldiers will only be given spirits for medicinal purposes.
