OUR OLD FRIEND, SULPHUR

KINDLY TRIBUTE TO ITS WORTH
BY DR. MORSMAN.

Useful and Efficacious in Numerous Ways—Old Fashioned, But Still a Favorite.

Sulphur does not come from the infernal regions, although we are told that it is abundant there. The authorities there are probably holding it for home consumption. At any rate they do not export any.

The sulphur marketed is nearly all of volcanic origin, but sulphur compounds, the sulphates, sulphides and sulphites, are very generally distributed in natural formations, and the sulphuret is found in all sulphur springs.

Brimstone is fused sulphur; sometimes called roll sulphur. Sublimed sulphur, or flowers of sulphur, is the ordinary yellow powder that your mother used to give you in molasses each spring to purify your blood and cure you of boils, pimples, prevarication and truancy. It did it, too; for playing hooky had no charms when followed by sulphur and sorghum. It had a little alterative effect, acted gently upon the bowels and you were the better for that. It is not used as much as formerly but it is still quite a popular remedy. In veterinary practice it is quite generally used and serves an excellent purpose.

In combination with senna, as in the compound liquorice powders, it is a very excellent cathartic, especially for persons who are troubled with piles, because it is non-irritating. It is a very good preparation although a bit old fashioned.

Sulphur is quite readily absorbed by the system and is eliminated by the bowels, kidneys and skin. If a person who is taking sulphur carries a silver coin in his pocket it will turn black owing to silver sulphide being formed on the surface of the coin. Now as he puts the sulphur in his stomach and the coin in his pocket it is pretty evident that the sulphur is absorbed by the system and eliminated in perspiration which reaches the coin.

Precipitated sulphur and washed sulphur are nicer forms for internal use than the flowers of sulphur, but they cost considerably more. The ordinary sulphur is cheap and it certainly has some good qualities that made it a popular household remedy.

Externally sulphur in ointment has been used for many skin diseases, in some of which it is beneficial. In skin diseases of parasitic origin it is very efficacious. It is a sure cure for itch and destroys the mites in a short time. For this purpose the alkaline sulphur ointment is the best to use. This is also a good remedy for mange in domestic animals. It has been used to drive away ants and roaches, but is supplanted by the dalmatian insect powders which is much more effective.

In the form of candles it is used for fumigation to destroy germs, or the ordinary sulphur can be burned in a metal dish. It does the work very well, but formaldehyde is more effective.

Ichthyol, now largely used by physicians, owes its medical virtues to the sulphur that it contains.

In veterinary medicine sulphur is quite important, largely because of its cheapness. Being an alterative and laxative and inexpensive it can be used to great advantage. It is a constituent of almost all stock foods and condition powders. In fact it is about the only good thing in most of the stock foods and horse powders that are sold and peddled as miracles of veterinary science and it wouldn't be there if it wasn't cheap. Many times instead of paying fifty cents for somebody's wonderful condition powders or stock food, you would do better to spend ten cents for sulphur. Some time I will tell you about these stock foods.

In giving sulphur to horses either give it continuously in doses of about one ounce a day or give four or five ounces for prompt effect. The former method is the best, and it can be continued until a laxative effect is produced.

The chemical compounds into which sulphur enters are very numerous and exceedingly useful and important, but it must be remembered that every element loses its identity and very often its properties when it enters a chemical compound.
