A SIMPLE, USEFUL REMEDY

DR. MORSMAN WARMLY PRAISES BORIC ACID (BORAX).

It is An Antiseptic, Very Mild But Continuous and Deserves a General Recognition.

I can remember well when one pound of boric acid, or boracic acid, as it was originally named, was a sufficient stock to last a druggist for a year. Then antiseptics was almost unknown and boric acid was only used for eye washes. Its qualities were little understood. Now twenty pounds is not a large order and is soon dispensed, some of it going out in pound cartons.

Borax acid is found impure in nature, either alone or in chemical combination with other elements. It is found in some mineral waters and can be obtained from sea water. It can also be prepared chemically from any of the borates, but the principal source of supply for this country is the native borax mines of California, and as these mines are controlled by the Pacific Coast Borax Co., of "20 mule-team" notoriety, so also they practically control the market and furnish the supply of boric acid.

Boric acid is an exceedingly weak acid, even when we use the word "acid" in the chemical sense. As the word acid is used by the public it does not apply to boric acid at all. The chemist calls it boric acid because it belongs by its nature and composition to the acid class of chemicals and not to the basic or alkaline class.

This drug is rarely used for internal medication. It was thought at one time that it would prove a good intestinal antiseptic, but it did not meet expectations. While it is classed as non-poisonous, it has its dangers in over-doses when given internally. It has been abandoned as an internal remedy, but its field is large enough as an external remedy.

It is an antiseptic; very mild, but continuous in its action and for external use, is absolutely without danger even in ignorant hands. This places it among the very useful remedies and this accounts for its rapidly increasing sale.

I told about Peroxide of hydrogen some time ago, and explained its antiseptic actions, but these two drugs do not conflict. Peroxide is quick, energetic, thorough but soon spends itself. Boric acid is mild, slow, continuous. Both can be used in the same wound with benefit—the peroxide to begin the work and render the wound aseptic and clean; boric acid to continue the action and maintain the antiseptic condition. Either can be used alone, but they seem to be made to go shoulder to shoulder in their warfare against germs. There are other germicides more active than either of these, but for domestic and general use these are the ones par-excellence, because they are efficient in all hands and there is no element of danger in either. I advised you to put peroxide of hydrogen in your medicine closet, and I also advise you strongly to add powdered boric acid to your stock; with these two you can give efficient "first aid" in any case of wounds or cuts. You can treat intelligently any sore or abscess and the surgeon who comes later, if he be needed, will approve your actions.

To apply boric acid to a wound simply sprinkle it over the entire surface. Quantity is a matter of no consideration. Whether the wound be on man or animal does not matter. It is just as valuable in the barn as in the house.

Many healing powders are to be had that contain boric acid. Some of these are much more effective and quicker in their action. This is especially true of veterinary healing powders, because it is not necessary to be careful about the odor of a veterinary powder and with that restraint removed it is easy to compound an antiseptic that combines the quick, energetic, action and the continuous effect.

Boric acid is odorless, which is another of its good qualities. As an eye wash or lotion, it is unique because here again it is exceedingly beneficial in its action, but without a single element of danger. "What! No danger as to how much I put in my eye?" you are apt to exclaim on reading that sentence. I assure you it is self-limited by its solubility. Water will only hold about five per cent. You can dissolve more by heating, but it will crystallize out in cooling. The cold water solution is strong enough to be effective for general use but entirely inside the danger limit. Such a solution can be used with benefit in nearly all cases of sore eyes from the irritation of grippe or head colds to inflammation and suppuration. I say with benefit, but I do not advise you to depend upon home treatment if the case is serious. Consult some one who knows.

Miss Floy Grinstead was hostess to friends at six o'clock dinner Monday evening. A delicious dinner was served. The occasion was complimentary to Miss Lillith Waggoner of Humboldt.

Miss Florence Judd entertained her former students at the Keister College. An elaborate dinner was enjoyed, after which all attended the afternoon session of the chautauqua. All had an enjoyable time.

Chautauqua.

The Chautauqua has come and gone. While it was not a seven-days-wonder, and there are those who are wont to kick because it did not satisfy all their extravagant expectations, it was good. The class of entertainments provided graded high. The management is to be congratulated upon having provided a program, remarkably clean, and wholesome. It was free from anything that might offend the most fastidious, and yet in the whole, reasonably within the range of those who made up the large bulk of listeners. We are only sorry to learn that the enterprise is not a financial success. It is unfortunate that cheap and often vile amusements pay well, while attractions that are for the edification of the public go broke.

New Paper For Salem.

We had occasion to go to Salem last week in the interest of a capable newspaper man who is looking for a new location.

We interviewed some half score of Salem's best business men and were most favorably impressed with the outlook there for a new plant. We had absolutely no desire to take advantage of the men interested in the Index and were everywhere given to understand that the Index had fully decided to go out of business.

This week we received a letter from Messrs Kjekham and Twist severely arraigning us for our temerity, and asking for an explanation. We trust this will be self-explanatory to both the proprietors of the Index and to the citizens of Salem. We sent two men to Salem Wednesday to interview the Index and if possible arrange an understanding. Our friend will start a paper in Salem if Salem so desires, if not wanted, of course we will keep hands off. The Tribune sought to do our sister town in her misfortune a good turn and sincerely hopes that our intentions will not be misunderstood.

Valuable Horse Cut.

While Simon Beachy was crossing the bottom, in going around the big dredge, which was crossing the road, last Thursday night he ran into a fence, severely cutting his fancy bay. The animal bled profusely, and by the time Mr. Beachy was able to reach town and get help the horse had nearly bled to death. The wound is healing nicely but will leave the animal a marked animal for life. Mr. Beachy has sued the Drainage Board for damages.
