The Old Reliable Jeweler and Optician

ANOTHER BELIEF UPSET

Dr. Morsman tells of Glycerine and incidentally jolts our old time faith.

From the packing house and the soap factory Glycerine comes to the pharmacist

Glycerine is made by decomposing fats and oils. It belongs to the class of chemical compounds called Alcohols and is so classified by chemists. The Germans call it Oelsuess, which means oil-sweet. When it was first discovered in 1789 it was called the sweet principal of oils. It can hardly be said to exist in the oil or fat but it is formed by a complex chemical change which takes place when they are decomposed or saponified.

It is made from fat by decomposition in the presence of steam under pressure and it is also a by-product in the manufacture of soap, and much of the glycerine on the market, comes from the soap factories, but it is just as pure as that obtained from any source.

In saponifying fat for soap the chemical changes are the same as in the direct manufacture of glycerine. The glycerine is thrown out. In fact hard soap from oil or fat cannot be made until the glycerine is first removed. Glycerine cannot be saponified, that is, it will not unite with the alkaline base of the soap. It follows therefore that "Glycerine Soap" is a trade name only. There is no glycerine in it. It is on the label and that is all.

There is a transparent soap made that contains a little glycerine. Manufacturers claim 33-1-3 per cent, but this is excessive. It probably does not exceed 5 per cent. Such a soap would absorb moisture from the atmosphere and get sticky. Pear's glycerine soap is transparent but it contains no glycerine. Nor is glycerine of any value in soap. Being soluble in water if there was any glycerine applied to the skin from the soap the water would immediately wash it off. But it isn't there. I am sorry to expose another pleasant delusion, but truth has no respect for beliefs.

Glycerine is a thick Syrupy liquid between oil and water. It is sweet to the taste. It feels oily but is not. It mixes readily with water, alcohol and many other liquids. It is a great solvent and increases the solubility of many drugs that do not readily respond to water or alcohol. For this reason it is often used as a menstrum, that is to hold other medicines in solution or to extract medicinal principles, such as pepsin for instance. It is a permanent liquid. I mean by that it does not ferment or change. In fact it is an anti-ferment, being feebly germicidal, and syrup mixed with sufficient glycerine will not ferment. It will absorb moisture when exposed to the air and get less syrupy but its properties remain the same except for the dilution. The glycerine on the market is of very fine quality. All that is inferior, so that it brings a lower price on the market, finds a ready sale for technical purposes. Much of it goes to the nitro-glycerine factories.

There has been a heavy advance in the price of glycerine due to the advance in pork and beef. Druggists buy it by weight and three-fourths of a pint weighs approximately one pound.

Artificial glycerine (synthetic) has been made, but it is expensive. In internal medicine glycerine is little used except as a solvent or vehicle for carrying other medicines. It is used in place of syrup when syrup is undesirable and to good advantage because it does not ferment in the stomach or intestinal canal. Taken internally it is laxative but not sufficiently so to be of much value. Some persons are inclined to "shy" at glycerine as an unclean substance because it comes from the packing houses and soap factories. That is a mistake. It is one of the cleanest of compounds. Like alcohol cleanliness is inherent in it.

Physicians once regarded it as a potent remedy for consumption, diabetes and gall stones, but it is recognized now that it has little or no value. In the form of enemata (injections), or suppositories it acts very promptly on the lower bowel and is much used in habitual constipation.

It finds its greatest use as an external remedy. It is emollient, soothing, softening, and non-drying. With the advantages of oil it has none of the disadvantages, and is much more effective. For chapped skin, excoriated surfaces, rough skin, and many skin diseases it is exceedingly useful and it is a component of many skin preparations. It is also used as a poultice combined with Kaolin (purified clay) and boric acid, and it is this preparation that is sold under the names Antiphlogistine, Anti-inflamatus, terraline, Denver mud, etc. They are all the same as the official Cataplasma Kaolini. The "Denver mud" story of several years ago was a fake cleverly exploited and the newspapers and doctors gave it free advertising. It was quite a joke on the doctors. We don't expect much from the newspaper man, he is the victim of all kinds of fakes.
