'Important Patient'

Spring was in the air, and Jim could no longer withstand the temptation of the display of camping equipment in the hardware store window. For what boy of 16 does not yearn for the adventure of spending a time in the open? Jim, however, should never have attempted to enter the store and help himself to the paraphernalia.

When he appeared in court, his mother and father came with him and listened attentively as Jim after several denials, finally admitted his wrong-doing. The father, a prominent physician and surgeon, was greatly disappointed in the boy's conduct and frankly declared he had little faith in Jim's mending his ways. The mother was deeply concerned about her son and her actions disclosed that she pampered him, granting his every whim.

The doctor had a large country practice, answered calls all hours of the night, left his home early in the mornings to perform surgical operations, and was completely out of touch with all the members of his family.

Jim was a bright lad, but he was considered "odd" by his classmates and was teased to the point of humiliation because of his artistic interests.

Although he hesitated to suggest to the physician-father that his son be examined by a psychiatrist, we did so, and the father readily consented. The psychiatrist reported that Jim was mentally superior to the average boy of his age, but was afflicted with a fully developed case of inferiority complex.

Jim told his examiner that his classmates often referred to the skill of his successful father, how he had this person's or that person's life. He declared, "It is apparent that my father is paying attention to everyone else but me." And so he lived a dream-life of his own, of which his father had no inkling.

It was a difficult task to go to this physician and tell him the diagnosis of and treatment for his son's social conduct. He was shocked into a realization of the way he had neglected his own son and immediately set about remedying it.

The boy's daily routine of diet and sleep was improved. The father, directed to devote more time to his most important patient, eagerly complied with every suggestion to go hunting, fishing, and camping with him. Father and son soon became great pals, and Jim took pride and interest in everything his father did, no longer being jealous of his success.

Shortly before the father moved to another location, we visited his office to check up on Jim, and while sitting in his waiting room we looked up on the wall and observed this motto in a golden frame: "He Who Helps a Boy to Become a Good and Strong Man Makes a Contribution of the First Order to the Welfare of Society."—Phillips Brooks.
