

Plattsmouth Young Man Tells of Deep Sea Fishing

Charles Hitt with Party from Houston That Enjoys Game Fishing in the Gulf of Mexico.

Charles Hitt, who is now located at Houston, Texas, writes the following interesting letter on a recent deep sea fishing trip in the Gulf of Mexico:

Houston, Texas, June 29. Dear Mother: The company gave the foreman and office men a deep sea fishing party. There was nine of us all told.

We left Houston at 2 a. m. Sunday morning and drove to Freeport arriving there at 4 a. m. We then boarded a boat at the docks there. It looked like a good sized boat at the docks but later when we hit the open ocean it seemed like a pea shell.

We went down the channel a couple of miles and then out into the Gulf. The water was quite dirty, until we got out about eight miles, then it got clear and blue, and it was quite rough. The waves were rolling up to about twenty feet high and our boat was pitching like a bronko, and I can truthfully say that anybody that has to take to the ocean from a shipwrecked vessel in an open boat is sure to have a very unpleasant time.

When we were about ten miles out we started to fish. We were fishing for Silver Kings. There was a bench built across the back end of the boat upon which we tried to sit and hang on to. We should of had seats that we could of been strapped into.

We had big rods and reels and a lure with a big hook in it rode on the water as the boat pulled them along. These Silver Kings are down in the water quite a ways and when they see the lure they shoot up to strike and they come out of the water some times full twenty feet. That was quite a sight the first one that struck. I caught the first two; they weighed around eight pounds. Then the other fellows started to get strikes, and also the gang started to get sea sick. It wasn't long before the superintendent and I were the only one able to fish; either one of us got the least bit sick.

When I say sick they were really sick; the deck hand moored them around on the deck where they wouldn't fall overboard but in easy access to the rail. We had caught several fish weighing from eight to twelve pounds when I got a strike that just about took me right out of the boat before the captain could reverse the engines. The brake was on my reel but the line sung right on thru anyway until I thought that the fish was going to take all the line I had, but I finally got it stopped and started to reel him in. I got him about half way in and away he went again and all I could do was hang on and try to stay in the boat. And that's the way we had it for some time. Some of the time I would have the upper hand and the rest of the time the fish did. When it began to look like the fish was going to take me out of the boat the captain came and helped me. We finally got him on board, and what a fish! Forty pounds. And if there is anybody who don't think it is a job to hold onto a forty pound fish at the end of one hundred yards of line and try to stay in a pitching boat at the same time just let them try it. Well we caught a few more small ones and they quit striking for about an hour and I was kind of napping when the first thing I knew I was all but in the ocean. Well, to make a long story short it was another forty pound fish and we had the same battle over again. The captain had to get in it earlier this time. In all I caught five fish that would total around one hundred pounds.

It sure is quite an experience, even just the boat ride. When the boat would start down off the top of one of the waves, it felt like going down in an elevator. It would be fine sport when the ocean is calm or be in a big enough vessel so it wouldn't pitch so bad. I really believe that the skill of our pilot in handling the boat is all that kept us from foundering several times. Everything on the boat was lashed down and it was impossible to walk on the deck without something to hold on to.

We got back to the dock about three p. m. and arrived in Houston at 4:30. I gave one of my forty pounds to one of the other fellows and took the other big one and three small ones home, then Billy and I had a job cleaning them. Billy said it was like butchering a cow. There are no bones to speak of in these fish; you just cut them across in steaks. We have supplied the whole neighborhood with fish, and Margaret has a week's supply in the freezer of the ice box. It cost the company seventy dollars which is pretty high, it seems to me, but we had lot of fun, even the fellows that were sick finally got over it and enjoyed themselves. And after being out where you can see nothing but sky and water and old mother earth looks pretty good. The fishing boats go out thirty-two miles. The captain told us they went out every day. If they don't have a fishing party they go out for shrimp. They catch shrimp for the canneries at Freeport. They have a big ice box on the boat to put your fish in when you catch them, and they had some of the biggest shrimp in there I ever saw, one of them would make most anybody a meal.

With love, your son, CHARLES HITT.
