

Plattsmouth Coast Guard Has Part In Invasion

John S. Slatinsky, Gunner's Mate Third Class Participated in the Luzon Invasion

ABOARD A COAST GUARD ATTACK TRANSPORT AT LUZON (Special)—The thunder of ack-ack fire pouring upward at the Jap plane sweeping over Lingayen Gulf was sweet music to the ears of Coast Guardsman John S. Slatinsky, gunner's mate, third class, of Plattsmouth, Nebraska.

Ever since the convoy sailed past Bataan and Corregidor and enemy bombers nipped at its heels and flanks, Slatinsky had been hearing his favorite symphony.

He had spent months keeping guns at his battle station tuned to concert pitch. The sights had not picked up a flying foe since the invasion of Saipan, although the ship had participated in the Leyte operation.

Now, in the embattled gulf, tracers were spitting upward intermittently from dawn until dusk. The plane which had been drawing the fire faltered in its flight, appeared to stall, then wobbled downward in the general direction of Luzon Island trailing smoke.

"That's the most rounds we ever got off at an enemy target," the local Coast Guardsman and his shipmates commented as they began picking up the shell casings. "The Nips better steer clear of these babies, because we've edue to start chalking up a few."

The crew's biggest thrill of the initial assault on Luzon came in the early hours of the invasion when Jap torpedo boats invaded the gulf. In pitch blackness the enemy craft managed limited damage before a spotlight caught one in full flight. Tracer bullets converted it into a flaming torch. Two more were similarly trapped and destroyed. The rest were routed.

Slatinsky, 19 years old, is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Slatinsky of Plattsmouth.
