Peggy Ann Almost Outstrips Wardrobe

The tree wasn't the only thing that grew in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn."

Peggy Ann Garner, the wistful and talented 2-year-old who won the all-important role of "Francie Nolan," was shooting up at a rate to scare the 20th Century-Fox wardrobe department.

Since she played Joan Fontaine as a child in "Jane Eyre," Peggy Ann had grown three inches. She stood exactly five feet tall and weighed 85 pounds at the beginning of the shooting schedule for "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." The wardrobe department was afraid she'd outgrow her costumes before the picture was finished.

But Director Elia Kazan refused to worry.

"If her clothes stop fitting her that will be fine for realism," says Kazan. "The Nolans, don't forget, were poor. They couldn't buy Francie new clothes every time she grew an inch."

"A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" opens Sunday at the Cass Theatre with Dorothy McGuire, James Dunn, Joan Blondell, Ted Donaldson and Lloyd Nolan also featured in the brilliant cast.
