RAF Fighters Attack Natives In Indonesia

BATAVIA, Nov. 1 (UP)—RAF fighters machine-gunned Indonesian Extremists Thursday for the first time, clearing the way for outnumbered British troops to recapture most of the interior strong point of Magelang.

An official British spokesman said Indonesian resistance at Magelang slackened considerably after the air attack. Three British-manned American Thunderbolts fired on three trouble spots in the city and observers reported direct hits.

British transports unloaded tanks at the Eastern Java naval base of Soerabaja to support British troops attempting to wipe out resistance there after the assassination of their commander, Brig. Gen. A. W. Mallaby.

In Batavia itself, representatives of the Dutch East Indies government and the unrecognized Indonesian Republic began informal talks aimed at ending hostilities in Java and reaching a political understanding.

Delegates of both sides outlined their views on the situation and explored grounds for further discussions later. Dr. Hubertus J. Van Mook, acting Dutch Governor-General, headed the Dutch delegation, and Dr. I. R. Sukarno, president of the so-called Republic, was chief Indonesian delegate.

Only last night, Sukarno broadcast an appeal to the population of Java to cease fighting the Allies. There was no point to such fighting, he said, since the Allies had come to Java only to send the Japanese back to their homeland.

A Revolutionist-controlled Soerabaja radio quickly followed Sukarno on the air, however, with a plea to the people to ignore the "peaceful chattering" and instead continue resistance.

The three RAF Thunderbolts were sent to Magelang after British commanders on the spot reported the situation "very grave". Large numbers of Indonesian troops gradually had wrested almost the whole city from the British despite large casualties.

Directly endangered were some 2,500 dangerously ill or convalescents, most of them Europeans or Eurasians. Almost all persons in the city hospital—where only a week's food supplies remained—were women and children.

gional isolationism is even more dangerous than is national isolationism.

American-Russian differences over the soviet policy in eastern Europe led to the breakdown and failure of the recent foreign ministers council. The United States has refused to recognize soviet sponsored governments in Romania and Bulgaria; it has protested Russia's unilateral negotiation of an economic treaty with Hungary; it is displeased with Russia's decision to reestablish diplomatic relations with Austria without prior big-power consultation.
