STOP JOHN CLAY
By Lionel Mosher

THE STORY: Fay Tudor asks Pike to leave THE SADDLE-BACK. Hitt, the desk clerk, tells him that Mr. Bateman, the librarian, had called to see him while he was out. Pike tries unsuccessfully to phone Mr. Bateman.

SOMEONE had put out most of the lights. Pike would rather Hitt didn't see him—or Roger Eland. But he wasn't going to creep out. He walked quietly across the lobby, reached the broad veranda, and went down the steps.

Here some instinct made him cautious. He turned in close by the porch and stood behind a cluster of evergreens. He waited and listened. And sure enough, the door opened, feet sounded on the porch and someone came down the steps.

It was Bland. He padded across the lawn and Pike could see him craning his neck and staring ahead into the darkness.

When Bland reached the road, Pike moved out from behind the shrubbery and followed him. Something prompted Pike to look back. There in one of the windows he saw a white face peering out with hands cupped around the eyes. Lesley Hitt.

Pike passed the rose trellis. The road dipped and a cool damp breeze came out of the woods. Pike kept 50 yards between them. He listened for cars. Once Bland looked around, Pike stepped into the shadow of a big spruce tree. He waited a few seconds, then came out. Bland was gone.

Pike started along the road again. The sound of his feet on the dirt highway seemed unnaturally loud. Then he heard a soft and stealthy sound in the trees. Rain.

Pike turned up his collar and walked a little faster. The rain began to run off the brim of his hat. Pike could feel it seeping through his coat as well gery in his mouth and stared in the darkness at the divan. He could feel a tingling in his scalp. Someone was on that divan. Someone lying full length on his back. "Mr. Bateman," he said.

In the silence that followed he could hear a clock ticking somewhere. He went over to the divan. He leaned down and put his ear close to the man's lips. He was not breathing.

Pike lit another match. He held it over the man's face. It was Bateman, all right and his face was still and white. He blew out the match.

A bell rang. The telephone. Pike turned and it rang again. Somewhere in the opposite corner of the room. It rang a third time and the sound of that bell lifted the hairs on the back of his neck.

He crossed the room and found the instrument. He picked it up and listened. He could hear someone breathing on the other end of the line.

"Hello," a voice said. It was a man's voice, muffled, indistinct, but filled with a sharp urgency.

Pike tried to think where he had heard it. He heard a little whirring sound somewhere and a clock began to strike.

"Hello," the voice said again. "Hello. Is that—"

The clock went on striking and Pike put the receiver back on the hook. He regarded the "phone sorrowfully. That was a damned fool thing to do—answering the phone like that.

He wiped the headset with his handkerchief. I've got to get out of here, he thought. But I'd like to know what killed Bateman. And who. He wished he dared show a light. He went back to the divan again. He lit his third match and gazed searchingly into that dead face.

There were no marks of violence, no sign of blood. The eyes were open, the lips drawn down. And the toupee was a tawny ashen. That toupee now. Would he have had it on if he hadn't been expecting someone?

There was a sound outside. A car door closed. Someone was coming up the steps. (To Be Continued)
