Two Refrigerator Cars Built Here By Burlington for Extensive Tests

Calvin Heyn, Plattsmouth E. A. Kneer

Two gain added information on basic problems of transporting perishables, the Burlington Refrigerator Express company has built two new test cars (shown above) at the Plattsmouth shops, E. A. Kneer, superintendent of the shops, has announced.

Each is a well-designed refrigerator car, incorporating advanced ideas in the protection of perishables while in transit by rail, Kneer said. In actual use, these cars will provide practical tests of new devices.

Cars on Display

The cars have been or will be displayed at Chicago, Scotts Bluff, Omaha, Kansas City, St. Louis, Denver, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Seattle. A test run will be made from Seattle to the east coast under government supervision, Kneer said. One test run from Wenatchee valley in Washington to the east coast under the supervision of the government has already been made and was successful, he said.

A committee representing shippers and receivers, the Association of American Railroads, the U. S. Department of Agriculture, refrigerator car owners and other agencies will use these new cars in a research and testing program, Kneer said.

Report Recognizes Difference

This committee expects to develop recommendations for an improved all-purpose refrigerator car. Some features of these two Burlington cars may be included in the findings, which should result in more efficient transportation service in the future, Kneer explained.

This program coincides with that proposed at the 1944 annual meeting of the United Fruit and Vegetable association when that group appointed a committee to consider and report on needed improvements in design to be incorporated in new refrigerator cars. That report recognizes the difference between features which have proved themselves practical and those which should be further studied for development and trial, Kneer said.

Building these cars, Kneer pointed out, is part of the Burlington's long-range protective service program.

Heater Service Supplied

In the fan-type car air circulation is lengthwise with fans circulating the air upward through the ice bunkers at each end of the car and into the body of the car, thus equalizing temperatures of both air and freight throughout the car, Kneer explained.

Bunker bulkheads are adjustable to provide increased loading space when ice bunkers are not required. The bunkers will hold from 9,600 pounds of chunk ice to 10,600 pounds of crushed ice.

When heater service is desired, portable heaters of approved design, burning either solid or liquid fuels, may be used in the bunkers. Eight ice bunkers are built into the overhead bunker car and are suspended from the car ceiling. Air circulation is maintained by natural convection. The bunkers will hold 8,500 pounds of coarse ice.

Cars Have Electric Lights

The car has a permanently installed underlung charcoal heater, with a wide range of adjustments for heat control, which warms anti-freeze solution which circulates through tubing located under floor racks.

With the exception of the difference in design of refrigeration ventilation and heating devices, both car bodies are identical.

Both cars have electric lights mounted in the ceiling, Kneer added. The doorway of the cars are five feet wide. Most refrigerator car doorways are only four feet wide. Both cars may also be ventilated by manipulating the combination hitch plugs and covers in the same manner ventilation is performed on conventional cars.
