THE walk back to the hospital was without incident and the two girls parted at Sally's door.

Inside her room, Sally prepared for bed still in something of a daze. Carolyn Bacon was not going to marry Jim Hallock—then who was he going to marry? Holden said he was engaged—but then Norma might have misunderstood Carolyn's engagement party just as she had. And what did it matter anyway? She determined to put the whole thing completely out of her mind. It was more than likely he would shun her presence in the future. No man enjoyed being accused of having an affair, no matter how casual or innocent, with a girl he scarcely knew. He would be justified in ignoring her henceforth. She would be the last to blame him.

Her conscience troubled her regarding the romantic past she had so successfully built up around herself and the mythical Blair Canfield. She had had no idea the story was to grow and travel until even Aunt Clem should hear it. And how on earth was she going to explain it to her? Should she make a clean breast of it—confess she had manufactured it—out of whole cloth simply as a protection to her pride—simply because certain people had jeered at her preference for a life of nursing—of service to others—rather than one of love and marriage? Knowing her Aunt Clem she doubted if that lady would understand or condone the deception. Aunt Clem loathed deception. Sally knew she was hurt at her beloved niece's failure to confide in her and she couldn't bear it. She brushed her hair with hard, almost vicious strokes and tried to find a way out. At last in something like despair she slipped into bed to lie wide-eyed for hours.

SHE awoke next morning feeling depressed and blue. It was quite early and she hurried to the bathroom where she showered and returned to her room to dress for the day. The shower had helped and she went down to breakfast feeling more like herself. Margaret met her in the lower hall and the two went in together. Sally ate silently, her thoughts still chaotic.

"Chapel?" Margaret asked as they left the dining room with the others.

"Yes," Sally said. "I feel I need it this morning."

The shabby room was glowing with sunlight and Sally felt rather than saw Jim Hallock seated just beneath the big stained glass window in the east wall. He sat with eyes straight ahead, arms folded across his broad chest and a look of grimness on his usually pleasant face. Chubby Bill Tyler was beside him and Sally was surprised to see the junior interne send a smile and an almost imperceptible wave of the hand in the direction of Dora Bronson who blushed and smiled in response. She wondered how long that had been going on but forgot about it when Miss Sunderlin rose to read from the psalter in her hand. She opened it to the Nineteenth Psalm. She read it slowly, impressively, and at its close added three verses from the New Testament. The favorite and familiar Twenty-third Psalm followed and suddenly Sally felt rested and ready for whatever the day might bring forth. She knew now what she should do. Aunt Clem was the only one who mattered—she would make a clean breast of her deception to her and hope she would understand.

BUT days were to elapse before Sally could confide in Aunt Clem Maynard. Full, busy days. She had no idea of what the superintendent of nurses said to Doctor Hallock or whether or not he told her of his convictions as to the writer of the anonymous letter. Sally's attitude toward Norma Holden remained much the same—casual and not too cordial. Norma continued to sneer but avoided the other girl as much as was possible in a hospital like Linton was at present with its depleted staff. Doctor Hallock, however, treated her with a coldness that was worse than complete ostracism.

Sally had expected to work in Pediatrics but after a week with the children was switched to special work in room 327. Again she heard the odious epithet of "Apple polisher" as she passed Norma Holden and another nurse just outside the chapel on her first morning on the new case. Her steps faltered for a moment as she contemplated facing the accuser but instead, with merely a slight stiffening of her slim back, she went on to the elevator.

"I won't let her bother me," she said to herself.

She had had little contact with Doctor Hallock. He seemed almost to avoid her. The ready blood rushed to the girl's cheeks at the humiliating memory of that meeting in Miss Sunderlin's office. He probably hated her now. And she didn't blame him. Was it possible he thought she had given Holden some reason for thinking she had dates with him? Sally gasped at the idea and in her distress sent the elevator past the third floor upon which 327 was located. She bit her lip and reversed the switch and the temperamental mechanism promptly stuck. Even the buzzer refused to work.
