Fifth stop—H. N. Erskine, Jr. Insect from South Hits Oats

An insect from the South has hit part of the Nebraska Oats crop, resulting in a yellowing and stunting of the grain.

Damage can be seen in spots and sometimes in a whole field. The pest is called spring grain aphid or the "green bug." It is a plant house, and does its damage by sucking and thereby sapping the plants.

Only one means of control is known under Nebraska conditions and that is expensive. It is benzene hexachloride three per cent gamma isomer dust. Ten pounds per acre should be applied.

A period of hot dry weather usually checks the activity of the insect.

Of each $1 spent for food in February, 1949, the farmer received 50 cents.
